Mr. President, the American people have answered such speeches as Mr. Bryan made and such speeches as have been made here to-day by the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from South Carolina. The answer of the American people has been emphatic and overwhelming that we had a right, according to the fortunes of war, to go into the Philippines. That country belonged to Spain.

We were at war with Spain, and we had a right to despoil our enemy of his possessions. We went there and we fought and overcame the armies of Spain. We took possession of that country and we have held it ever since, and we will hold it until the authority of the United States is recognized throughout that archipelago—recognized here in the halls of Congress and recognized there in all the islands of the Philippines.

Mr. PATTERSON. And you propose to hold them how much longer?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know how long we shall hold them, but we shall hold them until we get ready to do something else with them, at any rate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. We are indulging in historical reminiscences, and I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the great party to which he belongs, when it first appealed to the people of this country, was defeated, and the cry went up from its great leader that nothing is ever settled until it is settled right. If he appeals to the votes of the ignorant people who have followed his lead and that of the other despoilers of the Philippines as a vindication for this damnable apostacy to the Declaration of Independence he is welcome to the honor and to the enjoyment of it.

Mr. FORAKER. That nothing is ever settled until it is settled right is what Mr. Bryan said about his free-silver proposition after his defeat in 1896.

Mr. TILLMAN. That does not make it wrong.

Mr. FORAKER. He was defeated, but, learning nothing, he had to be defeated again.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the popular majority is the arbiter of right or wrong.

Mr. FORAKER. It is for the time being.

Mr. TILLMAN. But not forever, thank God!

Mr. FORAKER. Of course, Mr. President, there is no law in this country prohibiting a man or a party from persisting in error.

Mr. TILLMAN. Or persisting in right, either.

Mr. FORAKER. Therefore you were at liberty, so far as any law or custom or usage is concerned, to repeat over again in 1900 the follies that wrecked your political organization in 1896, and notwithstanding the verdict of the American people in 1900, you are at liberty to persist in the position you then occupied with respect to the Philippines.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if he entertains the same views in regard to the Philippines now that he did two days before we ratified the peace treaty?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir; as far as I know. I do not know what the Senator may call my attention to, but speaking in a general way, I do.

Mr. CLAY. I want to call the Senator's attention to a very remarkable speech, a speech which had a great deal to do with ratifying the treaty that we made, which was delivered two days before it was ratified. The Senator from Ohio then said:

> I do not understand anybody to be proposing to take the Philippine Islands with the idea and view of permanently holding them and denying to the people there the right to have a government of their own, if they are capable of it and want to establish it. I do not understand that anybody wants to do that. I have not heard of anybody who wants to do that. The President of the United States does not, I know, and no Senator in this Chamber has made any such statement.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. Wait one moment. I am not through yet.

Mr. FORAKER. That is a good speech. I am pleased to have the Senator read it; if he will only study it until he understands it, it will do him good.

Mr. CLAY. It is utterly impossible for anybody to understand it as agreeing with the position of the Senator on this occasion.

Mr. FORAKER. Read it and see.

Mr. CLAY. I want to read the following language, used by the Senator from Ohio on that occasion:

> Suppose we ratify the treaty. The islands pass from the possession of Spain into our possession without committing us to any policy. I believe we shall have the wisdom not to attempt to incorporate those islands with our body politic or make their inhabitants a part of our citizenship. I believe we shall have the wisdom, self-restraint, and the ability to restore peace and order in those islands and give their people the opportunity for self-government and freedom under the protecting shield of the United States——

Mr. FORAKER. I stand there precisely still. At that time, Mr. President, we had under consideration the question whether or not we would ratify the treaty of peace. It occurred to me, and, I think, it did to all Senators who voted for the ratification of the treaty, that it was the part of wisdom to take a cession from Spain of her title to the Philippines. Thereby we would bar out all other countries and the matter would be reduced to a question between ourselves and the Philippines.

On the floor of this Chamber it was being charged at that time that we wanted to take possession of the islands for the purpose of holding them perpetually as a colony, and ruling them outside the restraints and limitations of the Constitution and in such a way as to deny them all those personal rights and privileges guaranteed by our Bill of Rights.

I was making an answer to that kind of a speech that had been made just before I addressed the Senate, I think, by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], if I remember now correctly——

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. And I said in that connection that that was a matter nobody had yet determined; that it was necessarily a matter left for future determination; that there was no fixed policy in regard to it so far as I was aware; that so far as I was concerned (and I believe that opinion was general), when a government had been established and when the people had shown capacity for government and were set on their way, then we would take into consideration what we would do. I felt that I was safe in prophesying that it would be the will of the American people that they should be allowed self-government under the protection and guardianship of the United States of America, and I think so still.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FORAKER. But that is a matter to be attended to in the future, and so indefinitely in the future that it is worse than idle for us to talk about it here now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, the debate has drifted somewhat from the act.

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to remark that I had not finished reading it.

Mr. RAWLINS. I want to direct the attention of the Senator back to the provision in the act of the Philippine Commission for the punishment of treason. The Senator, the other day, if I understood him rightly, said that he agreed with President Schurman, who was formerly president of the Philippine Commission, that the eventual independence of the islands should be recognized.

I then invited the attention of the Senator to that section of this act which makes any advocacy of the independence of the islands, whether presently or eventually, whether by forcible or by peaceful means, an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment, and alluded to the statement which has since been verified by General Wheaton, that for such statements as were made by President Schurman, men were sent to prison in the Philippine Islands.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Ohio whether to-day he believes in that particular section of the act making the peaceful advocacy of the establishment at some time of the independence of the islands by peaceful means punishable by fine and imprisonment?

In this connection, before the Senator answers, I wish to make a statement of what was told us by the present president of the Commission, Governor Taft. He said at the time that act was passed there was peace throughout the archipelago except in some few remote provinces; that there was no hostility being carried on at Manila or anywhere in the archipelago outside of three or four provinces. That is the whole of it. Now, I will thank the Senator to answer.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. FORAKER. That is a sufficient question to answer for the present. The position of Dr. Schurman, of Cornell University, was referred to here in the Senate the other day. I said that I had seen in part what Dr. Schurman had said.

I had not seen his speech. I saw the Associated Press account of it that was published in the papers the morning after it was made, and in that account it was stated that in his speech he had quoted from President Roosevelt's message and had given his interpretation of what that meant, and that in his opinion it was the policy and the purpose of the Government ultimately, some time in the future, after peace, law, and order have been restored and government established and capacity demonstrated, to then give to those people local self-government. I do not know what degree of independence he may have contemplated, but that was the effect of it, and I said I took no exception to that, but agreed with it, and so I do.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me?

Mr. FORAKER. I was not through answering the Senator. Now, wait until I finish my answer.

Mr. RAWLINS. I wish to make just one suggestion.

Mr. FORAKER. I was only half through. Well, go ahead.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I only wanted to remark that while measured by the standard of this treason act passed by the Philippine Commission the Senator from South Carolina was denounced by the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I did not yield to the Senator to misrepresent what I said.

Mr. RAWLINS. And measured by——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. FORAKER. I decline to yield, and I claim the privilege of the floor that I may correct the statement just made by the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not denounce the Senator from South Carolina. The Senator from South Carolina announced that he was in sympathy with the Filipinos, and I said if so, in my opinion, the provisions of the Revised Statutes that had just been read were applicable to him if he were to announce that outside of this Chamber. That is what I said. There was no denunciation about it. I presumed even a Senator had a right to an opinion, and has a right to an opinion even when it differs from the minority in this Chamber.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Now, Mr. President, I was answering the question that was asked me a moment ago, in which my attention was called to what Dr. Schurman had said and what I said about Dr. Schurman's statement, and then the Senator wanted to know whether or not I agreed with the provisions of this Philippine act which prohibited the advocacy of independence. I wish to read what that provision is, for it has not been correctly stated by the Senator from Utah.

Of course that was an inadvertence. I understood the Senator to say that according to the provisions of this Philippine act it is made an offense, punishable in the severe way here provided, for people in the Philippine Islands now or ever hereafter to advocate independence. Let me read what the section is:

> Until it has been officially proclaimed that a state of war or insurrection against the authority or sovereignty of the United States no longer exists in the Philippine Islands it shall be unlawful—

And so on. It is not necessary to encumber the RECORD by reading it all.

In other words, Mr. President, this Philippine act is an emergency statute. It is a statute passed in recognition of belligerent right and belligerent duty. It is a statute passed to aid the authorities representing the Government in the Philippines in the suppression of insurrection and rebellion against our authority, and it is neither an unheard-of statute nor an unusal statute. It is just such a statute as was in force in this country during every war we have ever had.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARMACK. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the statute applies the penalties to any person who shall advocate the independence of the Philippine Islands by peaceful methods. In other words, if a number of Filipinos should get together and prepare a petition——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, that is precisely parallel to what the case would have been if, during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, the Senator by peaceful means, namely, by coming before the people had advocated by speech the cause of secession and the right of a State to secede and overthrow the Government and destroy the Constitution. That would have been treason. It would have been by peaceful means.

That was not tolerated, or, rather, Mr. President, I should say it was tolerated all too much. It was within the power of the Government to prevent by proper measures any such advocacy of the cause of secession as that would have been, although peaceful in character.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CARMACK. I want to know——

Mr. FORAKER. If you will wait a minute I will then yield with pleasure. In the Philippine Islands we are still engaged in war in five of those provinces. I understood from the testimony of Governor Taft (and I accept it without any qualification as true) that there is civil government in operation in all but five of the forty or more provinces in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CARMACK. What I want to know is——

Mr. FORAKER. In those five, however, there is still insurrection. The military and naval power of the Government are at work there to suppress an insurrection and establish and maintain the authority of the United States; and now, while that war is going on, it is treason for a man by any means, peaceful or otherwise, to aid the cause of the enemy of the United States, whether it is by peaceable speech or by taking a sword and gun in his hand.

Mr. CARMACK. The point I was making was that if a man in the Philippine Islands advocates peace and afterwards independence; if he says, "We are opposed to this war; we are for peace, but we want independence after the war is over," he is guilty of a crime under the statute.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, that is a question of construction.

Mr. CARMACK. It applies not simply to a few provinces which are in a state of war. It applies to the pacified provinces. If the people in those pacified provinces say now, "We have here a state of peace and we are in favor of independence; the war is practically over," and if they get up a petition and send it to the Congress of the United States, asking for independence, they are guilty of a crime under that statute.

Mr. FORAKER. That is a question of construction. I do not understand that the Senator is quoting the statute exactly correct. I do understand that it prohibits the advocacy of the cause of the enemies of the Government. We are there maintaining an army. It is the duty of that army to suppress the insurrection, and it is in a fair way to do it if the enemies of this country in the Philippines do not get too much encouragement from the Congress of the United States. There seems to be some danger of that just now.

Mr. CARMACK. If the Senator will permit me one minute——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I will state that, as I understand it, Governor Taft said that the provisions of this statute would apply to a party which has come into existence there advocating peace and afterwards independence.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know what his construction of it is. He is a good lawyer. He was a good judge when on the bench. He is undoubtedly more familiar with the statute than I am. I have never been able to read it. I only heard it read from the Secretary's desk. I did not gather from it, however, that it was quite so drastic in that particular as the Senator represents.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I wish merely to ask the Senator, the Philippine statute saying that anybody who owes allegiance to the United States and does the thing here or elsewhere shall be punished, whether in his judgment his speech, the extract from which was just read, would have rendered him liable to the penalties of that statute if they catch him in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. FORAKER. I would hope not, because I know if it would render me liable to anything, the Senator from Massachusetts would have been hanged long ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope you will not leave me out of that honorable coterie. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. If you are real anxious to be hanged, you might be accommodated. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, I hope nobody will be hanged. I should like to see peace restored. I think the best way to restore peace in the Philippine Islands is for the American Congress and everybody else in the United States to let it be understood that we propose to stand by the authority of the United States as it is there represented; that we intend to——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator and his party would let the Constitution go to the Philippine Islands, and would not be setting up a new colonial programme here which our forefathers spewed out of their mouths and drove England off this continent to extirpate, there would not be this opposition. But you are making a departure from every fundamental principle that the American people have ever held and stood by and fought and died for, and that is why we are opposed to your programme.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, Mr. President, if it were not that excuse it would be some other.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, of course.

Mr. FORAKER. When we acquired the Louisiana purchase the Constitution did not go there any more than it has gone to the Philippines, and not so much.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course——

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. FORAKER. When we acquired Florida by purchase it was the same, and it has been the same as to every other acquisition of territory down until this minute.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator pretend to say that when we bought Louisiana we did not guarantee the citizens of that territory the same rights as other citizens of the United States?

Mr. FORAKER. I know that in the treaty under which we acquired the Louisiana purchase it was provided that ultimately, when Congress should see fit to determine——

Mr. TILLMAN. The word "ultimately" was not in it; "as soon as practicable."

Mr. FORAKER. Well, let it be "as soon as practicable," then. The same was in the treaty under which we acquired New Mexico and Arizona, and for fifty years they have been outside the Union. It was in those treaties that the inhabitants of the territory so acquired should be ultimately incorporated into the United States as a part of it. But there was no such provision as to Porto Rico or the Philippines.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; it was left out purposely.

Mr. FORAKER. But, Mr. President, it is a very serious question whether or not the treaty-making power had any right to put into that treaty acquiring territory any provision of that kind that would be obligatory upon the Congress of the United States. We are the political power, and the Congress of the United Stetes has the right to determine the relation that any territory shall sustain to the Government of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the point I want to ask the Senator about is whether he is ever going to let the Constitution and the rights of American citizens go to the Philippines?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator had been diligent in reading what has been done with respect to the Philippines, he would know that the Bill of Rights, which is all there is in the Constitution practically that guarantees personal rights, is already in the Philippines. It is a part of the organic law under which this Commission is acting.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Bill of Rights is there, how does the Taft Commission get the right to deny trial by jury and everything else to those people?

Mr. FORAKER. Well, Mr. President, I can not answer all the questions that the Senator wants to ask.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should think not.

Mr. FORAKER. The provision for trial by jury is not found in the Bill of Rights. I call attention to the fact—and I did call attention to it a few days ago and put it into the RECORD—that in the letter of instructions given by President McKinley on the 7th day of April, 1900, published in the Annual Report of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, you will find set out in full every provision of the Bill of Rights as found in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. A ukase.

Mr. FORAKER. What does the Senator say?

Mr. TILLMAN. Coming not from this body, not from the people, but from the Czar, the new Czar we have set up in the White House.

Mr. FORAKER. President McKinley was the same kind of a czar that Thomas Jefferson was when the Louisiana purchase was made. When Thomas Jefferson was President and we acquired the Louisiana territory he did not stop to ask the people of Louisiana what kind of government they wanted. We simply sent the representatives of the Government down there and told them to establish a government and proceed with its operation, and in time, when Congress saw fit, they established a government without consulting the people or without giving the people the power or right of election.

When we acquired Florida the same thing was done by another Democratic President. Old Andrew Jackson was sent there as the Government's representative, and he did not stop to ask anybody's consent for what he was going to do, but proceeded with the use of the Army to restore law and order and establish the authority of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator contend that those sparsely settled, wild countries like Louisiana and Florida are the same as the Philippine Islands, where there are 200 or 300 people to the square mile?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, Mr. President, there is a difference. I would not consider them just the same. This is a much more difficult proposition in some respects. But the principle is the same whether there be a hundred thousand people in the territory to be occupied and governed or 10,000,000 people, as there are in the Philippines. That does not make any difference in principle or as to power——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me for just a moment?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator to say that the Bill of Rights had been extended to the Philippine Islands. Am I correct?

Mr. FORAKER. I understand so.

Mr. BACON. I hold in my hand, Mr. President, what we recognize as the Bill of Rights—the first eight amendments to the Constitution of the United States—and if the Senator will pardon me I will read them——

Mr. FORAKER. I will let you read them.

Mr. BACON. So that we may see as we go along whether there is a single one of them that is permitted in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. FORAKER. On what page is that?

Mr. BACON. I read from the amendments to the Constitution, the edition of our Manual, page 212.

Mr. FORAKER. Go ahead. I have it here.

Mr. BACON. Article I reads:

ARTICLE I.

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

I should imagine, Mr. President, that in the act which we have had read here to-day there was a somewhat serious effort to interfere with that.

Mr. FORAKER. Anything more serious than in the Revised Statutes of the United States?

Mr. BACON. Yes; and if the Senator will permit me to I will endeavor to show that.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want the Senator to do it now.

Mr. BACON. I do not want to do it now. I only want to read this in that connection, and then I will promise not to comment upon it:

ARTICLE II.

A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

Which is absolutely prohibited in the Philippine Islands.

ARTICLE III.

No soldier shall, in time of peace—

Nobody there is permitted to have any firearms, whether he is a soldier or a friend or an enemy.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Of course I mean the Filipinos.

ARTICLE III.

No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Some of these, of course, are not directly applicable.

ARTICLE IV.

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or things to be seized.

ARTICLE V.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

ARTICLE VI.

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Mr. FORAKER. That is about all there is of the Bill of Rights proper.

Mr. BACON. Then Article VIII provides:

ARTICLE VIII.

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand.

Mr. BACON. And I shall be glad if the Senator will point out a single one of them that is in force in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. FORAKER. I will take very great pleasure in doing so. I wish to correct what I said a while ago to this extent. The guaranty of the Bill of Rights that the people shall be allowed to bear arms is not one of the provisions of the organic law found in the instructions of the President; but that, Mr. President, we understand the reason for. It is because they have a state of war over there, and we are not bound to grant our enemies permission to carry guns.

Mr. SPOONER. There is nothing in the Bill of Rights, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. What do you call the Bill of Rights—the amendments to the Constitution or the original Bill of Rights?

Mr. SPOONER. There is nothing in the Bill of Rights, which has been read by the Senator, that I suppose he would claim would deprive the Government of the United States of the exercise of the power to prevent those who are levying war against the United States from bearing arms?

Mr. FORAKER. That is what I was calling attention to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Now, if the Senator will allow me, I will read what I refer to. After calling attention to the character of the Commission and the work in a general way which they are to perform, and admonishing them that they must remember the spirit and the great principles of our form of government, the President proceeded to say—I read from page 8 of this work:

Upon every division and branch of the government of the Philippines, therefore, must be imposed these inviolable rules:

That no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation; that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense; that excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted; that no person shall be put twice in jeopardy for the same offense or be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; that the right to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated; that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist except as a punishment for crime; that no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed; that no law shall be passed abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or of the rights of the people to peaceably assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances; that no law shall be made respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, and that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference shall forever be allowed.

Now I call upon the Senator from Georgia to admit, as he must, that every provision of the Bill of Rights is incorporated, by the the language I have just read, into the instructions given by the President to the Taft Commission when he sent it there to establish a civil government.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator calls upon me, I suppose I am entitled to answer, and I will do so very briefly.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not mean to call upon the Senator in a disrespectful way.

Mr. BACON. Of course not.

Mr. FORAKER. I perhaps should have said that I called his attention to it.

Mr. BACON. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. FORAKER. After saying what I have I perhaps should yield, but I would rather not do so.

Mr. BACON. I shall not intrude upon the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. I prefer that the Senator should take the floor at another time. I do not want to trespass unduly upon the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor, and the Senator from Georgia is out of order.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield.

Mr. BACON. I will not undertake——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Ohio yielded to me.

Mr. FORAKER. I have yielded to the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the Senator from Georgia failed to address the Chair and to get permission of the Chair to proceed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the point to which I desired to have the attention of the learned Senator was not the question of the instructions of the President—certainly not those alone—but what had been done under the instructions of the President.

The learned Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] suggests, and the equally learned Senator from Ohio, I should say in order to make no distinction, echoes the suggestion, that the provision with reference to the bearing of arms certainly never was intended to apply to those who are in arms against the Government.

But the point that I make is as to the statement upon the floor that 40 out of 45 of the Philippine provinces are not now in insurrection, but have been pacified; and yet I state as a fact, and I challenge denial, that there is not a single one of the 45 provinces in which any Filipino is allowed either to bear arms or to have arms.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention, if he will allow me, to the fact that the instructions I have read were given on the 7th day of April, 1900, at which time there was a very different condition of things in the Philippines.

Mr. BACON. Those were the instructions then. I am speaking of the conditions now and the regulations now.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BACON. Just one word, and I will not go further.

I simply invite the attention of the Senator—while of course there is a very great temptation to go further—I now simply invite his reply to the question, not whether it is proper or not, but whether it be true or not, that the act of the Philippine Commission, not with reference to treason as urged by him, but whether the eighth, ninth, and tenth provisions of that act, which the Senator has not yet discussed, are in conflict with this section of what is generally called the Bill of Rights, and especially the one with reference to freedom of speech.

Mr. FORAKER. I see what it is, Mr. President. Our organic law was intended, so far as all these provisions are concerned, for a time of peace. When there comes a time of war, the emergencies of war make many things necessary that are not contemplated; but I see nothing in these provisions to which my attention is particularly called that the Senator has any right to take exception to as inconsistent with the instructions given by the President, as I have read them.

They are, in the first place, Mr. President, a prohibition upon every person who shall utter seditious words or in any way seek to stir up for unlawful purposes——

Mr. BACON. Read all of it.

Mr. FORAKER. I wanted to save time, but I will take a great deal of pleasure in doing so, if I do not unduly detain the Senate, though I read it before——

Mr. BACON. No; you have not read it all.

Mr. FORAKER. I will read it again, and you will then see that I did.

SEC. 8. Every person who shall utter seditious words or speeches; write, publish, or circulate scurrilous libels against the Government of the United States or the insular government of the Philippine Islands, or which tend to disturb or obstruct any lawful officer in executing his office, or which tend to instigate others to cabal or meet together for unlawful purposes, or which suggest or incite rebellious conspiracies or riots, or which tend to stir up the people against the lawful authorities or to disturb the peace of the community, the safety and order of the government, or who shall knowingly conceal such evil practices, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. President, that is a statute that I can not add to by stopping to explain it or to comment upon it. It simply prohibits all acts, all talk, all efforts of a seditious character that are intended to obstruct unlawfully the authority of the United States. Now comes section 9:

SEC. 9. All persons who shall meet together for the purpose of forming, or who shall form, any secret society, or who shall, after the passage of this act, continue membership in a society already formed, having for its object—

Now, note what the object is—in whole or in part, the promotion of treason, rebellion, or sedition, or the promulgation of any political opinion or policy, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Let me ask——

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. PATTERSON. I call attention to the phrase "the promulgation of any political opinion or policy shall be punished."

Mr. FORAKER. I will say that I might make a very good reply to the Senator from Colorado by inquiring of him whether or not he imagines that if he were now in the Philippines his liberty would be interfered with by the provisions of this section?

Mr. PATTERSON. I think it might.

Mr. FORAKER. This section can not touch anybody who does not join a secret society, or continues in a secret society, he already belonging to one, which is organized for the purpose of fomenting and promulgating treason against the United States.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is not the language.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Wait a moment until I answer that. I will read the section again:

SEC. 9. All persons who shall meet together for the purpose of forming, or who shall form, any secret society, or who shall, after the passage of this act, continue membership in a society already formed, having for its object, in whole or in part, the promotion of treason, rebellion, or sedition, or the promulgation of any political opinion or policy, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Mr. PATTERSON. The promulgation refers to any political opinion. What does the honorable Senator say to that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is out of order.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope my words have been taken down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will take his seat. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. Why, Mr. President, there is not one word in this statute from the beginning to the ending of it that would touch any man loyal to the United States—not one.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Let me finish another section. I want to read that before I yield, and then I will hear the Senator.

SEC. 10. Until it has been officially proclaimed that a state of war or insurrection against the authority or sovereignty of the United States no longer exists in the Philippine Islands it shall be unlawful for any persons to advocate orally, or by writing, or printing, or like methods, the independence of the Philippine Islands or their separation from the United States, whether by peaceable or forcible means, or to print, publish, or circulate any handbill, newspaper, or other publication advocating such independence or separation.

Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $2,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year.

Now, Mr. President, as I said a while ago when commenting on that section, which the Senator from Georgia thought I had not read, they have war in the Philippines, and that is what we must remember. Our armies are confronting the battalions of the insurgents, or banditti, I should rather say, of the insurgents. It is a condition of war that they are legislating about.

The question is whether our authority shall be upheld or whether an independent authority shall be established there; and this declaration of the Philippine Commission is that it shall be an offense against the civil law for anybody to advocate that which our armies are there to suppress. Is there anything remarkable about that?

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator said a few moments ago that if I were not here in my official capacity I would have laid myself open to the charge of treason——

Mr. FORAKER. You have not been thinking about that all this while, have you? [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I have been thinking about that, and the Senator throws so much additional light upon my pitiable condition that if I should happen to go into this new possession of ours I would be really alarmed. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. Then I made more of an impression upon the Senator than I supposed I had. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Both the Senators are out of order.

Mr. TILLMAN. Have I permission of the Chair to address the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To address the Senate, certainly. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. I have read in the reports of General MacArthur, and I have heard it quoted, but have not read it, from the reports of General Chaffee, that practically the entire Filipino population are saturated with this hatred of the American people and this desire for liberty.

Now, I want to ask the Senator, after our experience of three years, after our throttling the aspirations of those people for liberty, which we had taught them to hope for, must we continue this infamous, tyrannical, British, South African, Spanish—I will stop right there; I will not put in the other words, because I can not find any harsh enough to express my indignation——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I apprehend that the present policy will be continued until, like all other policies of the Republican party, it has been made a triumphant success, and without any help from my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] or those who are affiliated with him. In the Philippine Islands we have a great task.

It is one nobody sought; it is one we assumed because of the fortunes of war; it was thrust upon us, and we undertook it with more or less misgiving, all of us recognizing its serious character. We all had hesitation; we all had doubt as to the step we should take; but when that step was taken, when we acquired those possessions, when we put up our flag there, when we sent our armies there, it was irrevocably settled that they would remain until our cause was victorious.

That may just as well be accepted as a settled fact. Gentlemen may rail about it in Congress or outside, newspapers may comment about it; but the American people having taken possession, we will establish law and order; we will set up a government; we will put it in operation, and we will give the blessings of our free institutions to all who are there to share in the protection we will extend, and not until all that is accomplished will we think of anything else.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, I will. I do not want to, though.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will simply give you a quotation. They "make a solitude and call it peace."

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, we heard very much of that same kind of talk when we were trying to legislate about Porto Rico. While proposing that legislation we heard from the Senator's side of the Chamber that it was tyrannical; that it was unjust; that it was unwise; that it was un-American.

Mr. CARMACK. Yes; and you heard it from the President of the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. No, Mr. President; we did not hear it from the President of the United States. The President of the United States in his message said this, which the Senator doubtless has in mind, that it was our "plain duty" to give the people of Porto Rico free trade.

The President of the United States made that recommedation in good faith. And we did give it to them. But when we came to undertake the task of legislation and to make an examination and ascertain the facts, we found out that there must be a civil government there; we found that if we would give them a civil government it must have a revenue to support it, and if it should have revenues to support it, it must have some system of taxation. They had no system of property taxation, and never had had any in Porto Rico. There was no system except to collect tariff duties and excise taxes, and the revenues so collected were insufficient to meet the necessary estimated expenses of the civil government we were establishing.

In that emergency, to meet that necessity, remembering the President's recommendation and sharing in the sympathy that he had expressed in that regard, we provided what? That on certain products between Porto Rico and the United States in commerce there should be collected 15 per cent of the Dingley rates for a period not longer than until the 1st day of March, 1902, or as much less than that time as they might be able to set up a government of their own, establish a tax system, put it in operation, and provide themselves a revenue.

And so successful was the government we established, over the votes of the minority in this Chamber and in the other House, that on the 4th day of last July absolute free trade was given between Porto Rico and the United States, just as the President said it was our "plain duty" to do.

Mr. CARMACK. Finally you did your duty.

Mr. FORAKER. What is that?

Mr. CARMACK. Finally you did your duty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee must observe the rules.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield. What was the remark of the Senator?

Mr. CARMACK. The remark was simply that, finally you did your plain duty, and finally did what the President of the United States and the Democratic party thought you ought to have done in the beginning.

Mr. FORAKER. When the President made that recommendation he knew about Porto Rico only in a general way; I knew about it only in a general way, and other Senators knew about it only in a general way; but when the committees were organized, a committee was appointed, and it was made the duty of that committee to examine as to the conditions in Porto Rico, and we discovered presently conditions that nobody had been theretofore aware of.

We found a million people there, 850,000 of whom could not read or write a single word in any language; we found more than 500,000 people in Porto Rico who had never owned a dollar's worth of property in their lives, and who apparently did not ever want to own a dollar's worth of property. That was the character of the people. They were without revenue and without government. The demand of the minority was that we should immediately give them the writ of habeas corpus and trial by jury, when there was not a lawyer in all the island or a judge upon the bench there who knew what habeas corpus and trial by jury meant.

Mr. CARMACK. I think the Senator is very much mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; I will yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CARMACK. I think the Senator from Ohio is very much mistaken in that statement.

Mr. FORAKER. In what statement?

Mr. CARMACK. If I remember correctly, Porto Rico exercised the right of self-government under Spain before it was taken by the United States. I know there were some very able lawyers from Porto Rico before our committee, the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, who stated that they were getting along exceedingly well under Spain, which had accorded to them the right of civil government in Porto Rico, and that they had a representative in the Spanish Cortez.

I will make another suggestion to the Senator from Ohio. He says after the committee got to examining into this matter they found out they had to impose a tariff on Porto Rican products. I will suggest to the Senator that the committee of the House, after very careful consideration, brought in a bill in accordance with the recommendations of the President, and that the sudden change of position was suspiciously simultaneous with the appearance of a very powerful lobby here about the halls of Congress.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, Mr. President, we have heard that kind of an insinuation before. It is unworthy the Senator from Tennessee to make such a suggestion in this Chamber or anywhere else. The suggestion was that the imposition of the tariff on sugar and tobacco was in the interest of the tobacco trust and the sugar trust of this country. That was insisted upon notwithstanding the fact that the legislation was in strict opposition to their interests.

Mr. CARMACK. I have never said anything about the sugar trust.

Mr. FORAKER. It is the most utter nonsense, and, as I said before, it is unworthy the Senator. The testimony was taken. It is in the record. It can be consulted by the Senator. He will find that in the first place I introduced a bill providing for free trade. It was referred to my committee. We examined into the subject. We called witnesses from Porto Rico. They told us of this poverty-stricken condition, of the inability of the people to pay revenue to support a government, and of the character of taxes they were paying.

And as a result of as careful consideration as any subject ever received at the hands of a committee—and that will be testified to by the Democratic members of the committee—we reported honestly, in good faith, as a necessity of the situation, that for the time being there should be 15 per cent levied on products passing commercially between the countries. That was a signal for a great outcry. It was tyranny; it was oppression; it was taxation without representation. We had forgotten the Declaration of Independence, the Senator and others told us.

Mr. President, there was not anything of the kind about it. It was simply an honest, patriotic effort to endeavor to legislate for the people of Porto Rico according to the necessities of that situation, and we met the necessities of it, and the result is a prosperity to-day and for the future of which the Porto Ricans are proud, and of which every American ought to be proud who had any part in bringing it about, and every American who opposed it, as the Senator did, ought to have regret that he did not help to do that thing, so beneficent in its results. And as it was in Porto Rico, so is it in the Philippines.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. I want to quit, but I will yield.

Mr. BACON. I want to ask one question. As the Senator is speaking of the great liberality and generosity and humanity of the United States in its treatment of Porto Rico, I wish to ask him if he does not remember when that bill was before the Senate, containing as it did a provision for the recoinage of Porto Rican silver, that there was an effort made, on the part of the minority, whom he says should now so greatly regret what they did, to insert a provision in the bill to the effect that when the Porto Rican coins were recoined by the United States Government, the seigniorage should not go into the Treasury of the United States, but that the Porto Ricans should have the benefit of it.

A calculation was made, and it was read to the Senate by the then Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Turley, in which he showed—I have forgotten how much—that a very large sum of money in that recoinage would come into the Treasury of the United States. An appeal was made here that the Senator and those who acted with him would permit the poor Porto Ricans to have that money, and the Senator and those who acted with him denied it, and required that the money should go into the Treasury of the United States, and that the Porto Ricans should lose it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. And I will say to the Senator, if he will pardon me just one second more, that if I remember correctly the amount of that seigniorage equaled what it was estimated would go into the coffers of the Porto Rican local treasury by reason of the tariff which was about to be enacted. So we were taking it from them with one hand and giving it to them with the other.

Mr. FORAKER. I remember very well indeed what the Senator refers to. Instead of the provision that he and his associates sought to put into that bill we incorporated this: We would take up their pesos, worth in our money about 48 cents on the dollar, at 60 cents each in American money, giving them 12 cents on every peso of absolute profit. Then on top of that we gave them more than $2,000,000, an absolute gratuity, out of the Treasury of the United States.

On top of that we gave them all the revenues collected in the island on the importation of foreign goods and the revenues on imports from that country into this and from this country into that, allowing them to put it all into their treasury, instead of putting it into our own for the benefit of the whole country, as we did in the case of Louisiana and every other Territory we have ever annexed. So it is——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. Pardon me for just one moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FORAKER. In one moment I will. We not only did that, but we spared them from the operation of our internal-revenue taxes, authorizing them to establish an excise system of their own far less burdensome and harsh than ours, and we authorized them to put every dollar of the money so derived into their treasury, something unheard of in legislation for any Territory belonging to the United States.

So our legislation with respect to Porto Rico was not only wise, as demonstrated by results, but it was the most generous, the most liberal, the least burdensome to them that was ever enacted by this or any other country in all time for a possession such as Porto Rico is. It is without precedent in the history of the legislation of the world.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Do I understand the Senator to deny the fact that under the provisions of that law as enacted the coinage of the silver in Porto Rico put about $2,000,000 into the Treasury of the United States, and that there was an absolute refusal on the part of the Senator to permit the change in the bill which would have given Porto Rico that $2,000,000?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not remember just what it figured out.

Mr. BACON. About that sum.

Mr. FORAKER. It seems to me the amount which the Senator has named is too large, but conceding it is $2,000,000 or $4,000,000——

Mr. BACON. I do not pretend that it was so large a sum as that.

Mr. FORAKER. Let it be whatever you say. My answer to that, as the Senate answered then, is that we were not going into free coinage. We were not going into any of these schemes for the coinage of silver money, such as were advocated in other connections, but we would make an honest and liberal transaction with the Porto Rican by which we would give him 12 cents on the peso more than he had any right to expect.

We took all their money and gave them our money instead, and there is not a human being on the island of Porto Rico who has ever found fault with what we did in that respect. To find critics you must come to the Democratic party of the United States.

Mr. BACON. The Senator grows eloquent, but he does not answer the question.

Mr. FORAKER. I think I have.

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not answer the precise question. He is boasting of the great liberality to the Porto Ricans. The precise question which I ask is, whether under that act, not passed inadvertently as to this particular feature, but over the protests of others, the seigniorage on the coinage of that silver, which we asked should go to Porto Rico, did not go into the Treasury?

Mr. FORAKER. We did not concede that it should go to the Porto Ricans instead of the United States any more than we would concede it in any other case.

Mr. BACON. I ask the question was that done or not?

Mr. FORAKER. We simply applied to the Porto Rican transaction the same rule precisely that we have followed with respect to the acquirement of silver and its coinage when we buy from others; we then go into the market and pay the market price. If we had treated Porto Rico as we treat our own people we would have paid but 48 cents for it at that time. Instead of that we paid them 60 cents, and that, I say, was a most liberal transaction. That is all I can say about it. These are matters about which men will differ.

I want to hasten to a conclusion. I intended calling attention, when I started out, to the statute and to emphasize the fact which must have occurred to every Senator who listened to its reading at the desk that it is almost word for word the statute that is in force in this country to-day, and which has been in force since the very beginning of our Government in respect to the definition of treason, and the penalties and punishments that shall be inflicted upon conviction.

If you will take the statutes and compare them you will find that necessarily the Commission had our own statute before them when they framed this. The section which the Senator from Massachusetts particularly complained about is word for word, from beginning to end, a copy of our own statute. His only excuse for complaining of its enactment in the Philippines, I understand, is that it is liable to be violated over there.

I take it the framers of our statute—our fathers who organized our Government—supposed that that statute would be violated. As the Senator from Wisconsin has suggested to me, it was not only understood by the men who framed our Government, but it was understood by the men who drew and adopted the Declaration of Independence, of which we have heard so much.

They believed in government. They believed in sovereignty. They believed in that government exercising the power necessary to preserve and protect and perpetuate its life against foreign or domestic foes. They believed not only in protecting against foreign foes and domestic foes in arms, but also against those who would conspire by joining secret societies and forming cabals and otherwise engaging in works of sedition calculated to obstruct the authorities and work the overthrow of the Government. They legislated accordingly. That is all there is to it.

Mr. RAWLINS. While the Senator is alluding to the act of our forefathers, I would invite his attention to the act known as the alien and sedition law, from which I think this act of the Philippine Commission is more literally transcribed than from the act which is now contained in the Revised Statutes of the United States; and while the ancestor of his political party perhaps occupied the same position as the Senator does to-day in its advocacy of that measure, it was disapproved by the fathers, and at the next election that party was overthrown and the founder of the Democratic party was elected President of the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. At another time I will take up the alien and sedition law, if the Senator insists upon it, but now, in view of the lateness of the hour and the long time I have trespassed upon the Senate—I will not say trespassed, for I do not believe any Senator is trespassing when he is addressing the Senate—but in view of the long time I have been indulged, I want to conclude at this point.

Mr. TELLER. I was going to ask the Senator if he would not prefer to go on to-morrow?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not think I would. I think I have said all I care to say, but I am much obliged to the Senator for the suggestion, and I will reserve that right.

Mr. TELLER obtained the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I want to set right——

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I want to set right the statement made by the Senator from Ohio in reply to me. It will take but two or three minutes.

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I asked the Senator from Ohio, during his eloquent remarks, whether the people of Ohio and whether he loved and reverenced the memory of Thomas Corwin, to which he replied that they did, and added that the people of Ohio settled questions of justice and righteousness by ballot.

Mr. FORAKER. That was in answer to another question.

Mr. HOAR. That was in answer to another question; but I suppose the Senator made no answer to any question that he did not believe to be true. I know that.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly not; but I want to keep up the connection.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator added that the people of Ohio never afterwards elected Thomas Corwin to a position of honor or trust. In point of fact, unless I am all wrong in my history, Mr. Corwin was not only made a member of the Cabinet by the President of the United States and the Senate after that famous declaration of his, that if he were a Mexican, as he was an American, he would welcome you with bloody hands to hospitable graves, but he was appointed minister to Mexico afterwards to represent this country there. Not only that, but he was elected three or four times a Representative of an Ohio district.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not hear the last statement.

Mr. HOAR. He was elected several times a Representative by an Ohio district.

Mr. FORAKER. Elected to the House?

Mr. HOAR. Elected to Congress.

Mr. FORAKER. In answer to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said, if I was in error I withdraw that statement. It may be that Mr. Corwin was so elected. When I made the answer I did it was my recollection that Mr. Corwin had never after that time been elected to any office. I knew he had served as minister, representing this country in Mexico, and I should have recalled, although I did not at the time, that he had served in the Cabinet. But I did not remember that he had ever come to Congress.

Mr. HOAR. He was twice elected.

Mr. FORAKER. After that?

Mr. HOAR. I want to add further——

Mr. FORAKER. I was not quite through, if you will allow me. What I had reference to was any election by the people of the State of Ohio. He was very much beloved in the district he represented and by all who personally knew him.

Mr. HOAR. I want to add that as I understand the history of Ohio, having been an admiring reader of it, that a very short time only elapsed after which, for a good while, no man could be reelected in great sections in Ohio to any political office whatever who did not thoroughly sympathize with and approve that sentiment of Thomas Corwin.

Because of that single utterance, so honest and so brave and so pregnant with the love of liberty, because of that single utterance to a hostile Senate, Thomas Corwin's name has become one of the great treasures of the Republic. His office, his political power, his eloquence even would have gone into the forgotten annals of the past, but that single standing by righteousness and liberty against even a hostile majority of his own countrymen has put him forever and forever among the immortals.

Mr. President, I wish to say that we need not take these things too seriously. They are great questions. It is a great question whether this Republic of ours, with its immortal glories, shall crush out by power a rising republic, seeking to build itself in freedom and in independence on our model, in accordance with our principles. It is a great question whether we shall refuse to stop the slaughter of hundreds and thousands of Filipinos and of thousands of our own youth by the simple utterance to them of what the Senator from Ohio again and again said he believed, that they ought to have their independence in the end, or whether we shall carry on this terrible business without a limit, increasing and increasing the sentiments of hate that that whole people feel to us, on what I call the wretched pretext that we will not tell men who have arms in their hands what we are going to do with them, which seems to me as reprehensible an utterance as ever came from the lips of an American Senator in the American Senate.

But, at the same time, thinking as I do about these things, I know very well that men as good as I am and wiser than I am differ with me. I do not believe that the brave and honorable Senator from Ohio, a gallant soldier, a great orator, a great statesman, wants to do injustice to any man, and he does not believe for a moment that the men who take the view that I do about these things are traitors to their country or love the flag any less than he does.

Some men show their love for the flag of their country by protecting it from violence; and it is a noble thing to do. Other men show their love for the flag of their country by keeping it pure and preventing it from becoming the symbol of tyranny and injustice.

Is not that, my friend from Ohio, an equally honorable thing to do? You know it is, and we all know it is, and the Senator from Ohio will say any time when not in the heat of debate—he will say it in the heat of debate when he is asked—that the Senators in this Chamber who are resisting this policy are as loyal lovers of their country to-day as he is or as I am. But yet we must discuss great questions of justice and of righteousness on their own merits, and not on the merits of the men who think one way or the other about them.

Now, Mr. President, I have but one word more to say. I differ from the honorable Senator from Ohio when, if I understand him aright, he said that it was a right and righteous thing to do (differing in that respect from his distinguished constituent, Governor Taft) to enact that if a son did not inform against his mother, or a wife did not inform against her husband, or a mother did not inform against her boy, they should be sent as felons to the penitentiary for seven years.

The Senator said he thought that was all right. Just think of it! He thinks that is all right. The mother is to be sent to the penitentiary if she does not inform against her son; the wife is to be sent to the penitentiary if she does not inform against her husband; the boy is to go to the penitentiary if he does not inform against his mother, if she has comforted her next-door neighbor when he is waging war against the United States.

That is what being in favor of this Philippine Island business brings, honest men to thinking in the year of grace 1902. That is the legitimate result of this cup that you have been holding to the lips of the American people.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator seeks to justify this thing by the fact that our ancestors in 1790 passed a statute with the same provisions. But they never dreamed that any conditions like these would exist or that any conditions would exist where a mother or a son or a wife might be brought to trial under it. They were thinking only of persons who were helping the enemies of this country in foreign wars; that was all. But even then they surrounded it with the great precaution that it should only be proved by two witnesses; that it should only be punished on a trial by jury; that the man should only be sentenced by a judge independent and for life; and that the trial should be by the peers of the person charged, twelve of them agreeing upon the guilt, and it should take place in the vicinage where the thing happened.

You deny all that. The Constitution does not go with the flag. You provide instead of it other equally outrageous enactments, under which the Senator from Ohio himself has been compelled to admit that the speech he made a few years ago, and, if I recollect aright, the speech he made four or five days ago, giving aid and comfort to these people who want independence, being made elsewhere, and if they can catch him in the Philippine Islands they can hang him for treason under the letter of that act.

Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate at this time of the day to talk any more about this matter. I expect to refrain from discussing this case in general until it is all in under the pending investigation, but I wish simply to say that what I have said is what this Philippine Island business has brought good men and brave men and wise men to advocating on the floor of the American Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator from Colorado will let us have a short executive session.

Mr. TELLER. Very well. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 7, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 6, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering appropriation bills; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the legislative appropriation bill, which I propose to call up in Committee of the Whole, be closed in two hours.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentlemen on our side do not wish to occupy time, I shall not object.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The bill about to be considered is, I believe, one of the great approppiation bills, is it not?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is.

Mr. DE ARMOND. In view of the latitude of debate which has been allowed here within the last few days, and the time at our disposal, I think we can afford to give more than two hours to the discussion of this measure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] objects.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of general appropriation bills, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. LOUD in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10847) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, the legislative appropriation bill for the current fiscal year carried $24,668,248.85—$503,721 less than is recommended for the fiscal year 1903. There was carried in the urgent deficiency bill for the current fiscal year $295,555. Added in this bill for free rural-delivery service, formerly paid from a lump sum appropriation on the post-office appropriation bill, is $275.040, making in the two items $570,595. Taking these items into consideration this bill does not carry an increase over the amount expended and to be expended for the current fiscal year.

While the bill shows an increase of 468 in the number of people employed, a large number of these employees are now in the service. The increase is largely accounted for by the free rural-delivery service, 266 having been formerly carried on the Post-Office appropriation bill. For the Library of Congress there are carried on this bill 34 new employees. In undertaking three years ago to catalogue the books now in the Library we proposed to give the Librarian 91 new employees. We gave him one-third of these people for the fiscal year 1901, one-third more for the fiscal year 1902, and now we give in this bill the additional number, 34.

In the office of the Treasurer of the United States there are 82 new employees provided for. These are made necessary by the change in the currency law. In the auditing department of the Post-Office Department there are 51 new employees, making altogether in these four departments 433 new employees. When I say "new employees," I mean new to this bill. A number of them have heretofore been in service and carried on other bills. The remaining number are distributed among the other departments and have been made necessary by the increase of business. There were many recommendations for increase of salary, but very few have been granted by the committee.

The committee in the report accompanying the bill has carefully set out under each separate head all changes made, so that members may be informed as to the changes without reading the bill to ascertain where they are made.

By oversight two changes made in the bill are not included in the report, and I want to call the attention of the House to those two changes. One change made in the office of the Light-House Board, wherein the pay of one laborer is raised from $600 to $650 per annum, and in the office of public buildings and grounds, where the contingent fund is increased from $600 to $700. By going through the report, which members can secure, you will see pointed out every change made in this bill, either in the way of increase of salary or increase of force or limitation of appropriation. The question of temporary clerks now in the different departments of the Government is taken up on this bill. When this temporary force was granted, the Committee on Appropriations believed that their services would not be necessary for any great length of time.

We find, however, that the services of this temporary force are absolutely necessary to conduct the business of the several departments; and, in fact, in some of the departments they insist that they not only need all the temporary force, but an additional force. There is only one department where a recommendation is submitted to decrease that force. That is the War Department, where they submit a decrease of only $5,000 in the total appropriation of $600,000. Many of the departments have insisted that this force ought to be covered into the civil service; but as we do not legislate on appropriation bills, no legislation in that regard is placed upon this bill, and the force is carried as a temporary force for another year.

Mr. STEELE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there is no change in the language of the appropriation?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no change whatever as to the temporary force.

Mr. STEELE. It gives the President no more latitude than he heretofore had to cover them under the civil service?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no change in the language in this bill. It carries the same language as to the temporary force as for the former temporary force.

The question as to sick leave has been discussed upon the floor of this House, and the committee have gone to the trouble of securing a statement from each of the departments showing the total number of days of annual and sick leaves taken in the different departments. By referring to page 11 of the report, members will find this table:

Annual and sick leave of persons employed during the whole of the calendar year 1901 in certain departments and offices at Washington, D. C.

Department or office.	Number of employees.	Average days of annual leave.	Average days of sick leave.	Average days of total leave.
Department of State	81	26.4	8.6	35
Treasury Department	2,927	27.3	6.8	34.1
War Department	1,621	26.5	7.2	33.7
Navy Department	430	25.7	4.2	29.9
Department of Justice	96	26.1	7.3	33.4
Post-Office Department	714	22.1	6.1	28.2
Department of Agriculture	553	24.7	7.5	32.2
Department of the Interior [a]	3,219	26.9	8.5	35.4
Department of Labor	79	28.9	7.6	36.5
Interstate Commerce Commission	127	25.5	12.9	38.4
National Museum	181	23.7	8	31.7
Total	10,028	26.4	7.4	33.8

[a] Not including the Census Office.

So you will see that in the great departments of the Government both the annual and sick leaves added together do not result in the employees of those departments taking much over thirty days' annual leave, and the average is thirty-three and eight-tenths days, which includes the annual and sick leave. It is true that there are a number of clerks in each of the departments who take the benefit of the full thirty days' sick leave. You must, however, understand that under the law they are not entitled to sick leave unless in extraordinary cases; but a number of employees in these different departments do take advantage of this sick leave and secure the full thirty days, and in some instances more than that. When they have more than thirty days' annual and thirty days' sick leave, it is without pay; but, taken as a whole, this table will show that the sick leave is not abused to any great extent.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A question on that proposition. Did the committee investigate as to whether adequate safeguards have been established in the various departments so as to prevent an abuse of sick leave?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have the rules and regulations of each of the different departments. The rules in some of the departments are more strict than in others. In the Department of Labor they require an affidavit of the employee that he was sick and unable to attend to his duties. In other departments they only require the certificate of a physician. Gentlemen may secure by application the rules of the other departments in regulating this sick leave. They are so long I will not take up the time to go into details.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is one further question that I desire to ask the gentleman. Does the bill provide for any increase in the force of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The bill does not provide for any increase in the force of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Do they recommend and request an increase in the clerical force?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They have annually for a number of years recommended an increase in the force.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the Commission ought to have an increased force? It is a matter that is known to every member of the House that the Commission is from five to eight months behind in its work of examination and classification of papers, and if the Commission is to continue to do business and provide an eligible list for civil appointments it occurs to me it ought to have an adequate force to transact its business properly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that by details from other departments, under the law, the Commission can receive and do secure sufficient force to transact their business.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I had a talk with a member of that Commission only two weeks ago, and he told me that they were about five months behind in the examination of papers, and that it was on account of lack of adequate force.

Mr. HEMENWAY. They have detailed to their office from other departments numerous clerks, and I understand can secure more if they desire. At least, it is lawful for clerks to be detailed from other departments to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, there is one other question. I have not had time to read the report, as I might otherwise have done, to inform myself in relation to these things; but there is one question that is not shown in the report. On page 16, in relation to the employees of the House, I notice that 13 messengers are provided for at an annual salary of $1,200 each, and 13 messengers at an annual salary of $1,000 each. Why is a distinction made in the salaries of these messengers?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In that respect we followed the current law. We make no increase in the salary of any employee of the House.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The law fixes the salaries and the number.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The existing law fixes the salaries and the number.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I ask the question because I am informed that these messengers all do substantially the same work and carry the same responsibilities, and 13 get twelve hundred dollars a year, while another 13 get a thousand dollars a year; and that accounts for the numerous resolutions introduced at the close of every Congress to equalize the pay of men doing the same service, in order that they may be put upon an equal basis. I had been hoping that their salaries might be equalized in the law, either by raising the salaries of some or lowering the salaries of others.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest to the gentleman that all the messengers do not perform the same service. There are positions about this House requiring a higher order of ability in a messenger than other places. The difference in salary is made so that those performing more important duties may have higher salaries, and so that there may be room for promotion from time to time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. At the close of every session of Congress we have been passing resolutions increasing the pay of messengers upon the representation that they were doing the same work and bearing the same responsibilities of others receiving higher pay. We have been passing those resolutions right along, and I presume we have been doing it upon a misapprehension of the facts, in view of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think the gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension. The increase of salary was where folders or laborers were performing the duties of messengers, and the increased pay was asked to make up the difference between the pay of a laborer or folder and that of a messenger, as the case may be. I have no recollection of any case where the salary of one messenger was increased to equal the salary of another.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have one case in mind where a thousand-dollar messenger was paid at the rate of twelve hundred dollars because he did the work of a twelve hundred dollar messenger. I introduced the resolution myself, and it went through.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope that the gentleman and other members of this House will not be so successful at this session of Congress in getting that class of legislation passed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It may be that I may be able to induce this man to repay the money back into the Treasury after the explanation of the gentleman from Indiana that he is not entitled to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman again to the subject of the sick leave of employees in the departments, a subject to which the committee addresses itself largely in the report. I understand that in the Executive Departments in Washington the heads of those departments may require not less than seven hours' service of employees and not more than eight hours, and that these employees are granted an annual leave of thirty days with pay, and in addition to that they have thirty days' sick leave with pay each year.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, just to correct the statement he makes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The law requires that they shall perform not less than seven hours' service.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I stand corrected.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The head of a department may call upon them to put in seventeen hours a day if he is so disposed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Under the law, can they be required to perform more than eight hours' work?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Now, the gentleman has said that there is no abuse of the sick-leave privilege in Washington——

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman does not want to misquote me. I say that in instances there is abuse of the sick leave in Washington, that in many instances there is abuse of it, but on the whole the result is not bad.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman does not hold the heads of departments responsible for this, because he says they are doing the best they can under the law. That is the only position in which I desire to place the gentleman. I believe he says that; but the fact nevertheless remains that this abuse exists, and I want to ask him if his committee have considered this branch of the question, that the Government employees here in Washington have sixty days' leave of absence with pay, while the employees of the Government outside of the city of Washington many of them have no leave of absence at all, while others have but fifteen days' leave of absence, and none have the sick-leave privileges unless they are connected with the Executive Departments here in the city of Washington.

Now, has the gentleman's committee considered the question of reducing the sick leave, or cutting it away altogether as a privilege granted to the executive employees in Washington? I rather hoped he would do that, so there should be some means of equalization of the privileges of vacation of all employees throughout the United States.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that there is no law giving to the clerks of the departments in Washington thirty days' sick leave. The heads of departments may give them that leave if they so desire.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Under the law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Under the law, but there is no law requiring it. On the other hand, the law requires that limited leave be granted for department clerks outside of Washington.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman is mistaken in regard to that.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will call the gentleman's attention to the law. In 1890 fifteen days were given to clerks and employees in first and second class post-offices and to the employees of mail-bag repair shops, and in 1892 thirty days to employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which was extended in 1896 to compositors and pressmen in the auditing division of that Bureau.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the gentleman will pardon me, this is not sick leave, but vacation. In the first place, the printing department in Washington have no sick leave; they get an annual vacation of thirty days, but they do not receive a sick leave.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call the gentleman's attention to the error he makes—that there is a thirty days' sick leave granted other employees. The table on page 11 of the report shows that they do not get thirty days' sick leave; that the average sick leave, over and above the thirty days' annual leave, is only three days and a fraction. Now, observe the statement: You take all of the departments at Washington and the average sick leave is only a fraction over three days.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the law expressly provides thirty days' annual leave of absence, and expressly provides that the department heads may grant thirty days additional, which means that they will grant it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The law does not expressly grant thirty days' leave of absence with pay.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the law does grant thirty days' vacation and thirty days' additional sick leave. True, it is discretionary with heads of departments. I asked the gentleman if his committee had looked into the question of limiting and restricting or cutting away entirely the thirty days' sick leave.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we have no power by the rules of the House to legislate on this question in this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yet in 1898 and 1899 you did legislate on this bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The rules of the House expressly prohibit legislation on appropriation bills. If the gentleman wishes to change the law, the proper way to go about it is to introduce a bill to that effect.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I appeal to the gentleman's well-known knowledge of parliamentary law and a practice sometimes followed, and refreshen his recollection, that the committee of which he is chairman has legislated on this subject. In 1898 and 1899 the committee took away a part of the sick leave, limiting it from sixty to thirty days, as shown by his report before us, and I ask the gentleman whether his committee have considered the subject of taking away the thirty days' sick leave?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not with a view to legislate upon it, because the committee does not want to legislate on this appropriation bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. They have changed their mind then since 1898, for they did legislate on this kind of a bill and reduced the sick leave.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no doubt but at times, by unanimous consent, legislation has gone on an appropriation bill. It may do so again, to-morrow or to-day, by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I only ask the gentleman if his committee had considered the advisability of placing legislation on this bill and taking away the thirty days' sick leave of the administration employees in Washington so that we might deal justly with those outside of Washington?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have considered the subject, but not with a view to legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have introduced a bill on that subject, and when the time comes I hope the gentleman will support it.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he will explain in regard to the board of pensions and how many new employees are created.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We create 20 additional employees for one year's time. The condition there is this. They are two years and over behind on the disposition of pension bills. The Secretary of the Interior desires that this work shall be brought up. The force now employed can keep up with the examination work, but they can not catch up on the two years that they are behind. So we provide for 20 temporary people for one year's time to bring up the work in arrears.

Mr. COWHERD. Is it the idea that these people will be appointed from persons outside of the Department?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They will be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior outside of the Department, and, in my opinion, should in no way be connected with the Pension Office, so they will feel free to reverse the decisions of that office when they think it is not founded on the law and the evidence. I know of many worthy soldiers who have had appeals pending for two years that are not yet acted on, and it is not right that men who fought to maintain the honor of their country's flag, and made it possible that we could now enjoy the wonderful prosperity that we are enjoying, in their old age and unfortunate condition that resulted from their service should be compelled to wait two years to have these appeals settled.

Mr. COWHERD. And the board will be increased by this additional 20 for just one year.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes, sir; for one year, in order to bring up the arrears of work.

Mr. LLOYD. I notice that the bill contains a provision for "the office of the Vice-President." Does "Vice-President" mean the President of the Senate?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no appropriation carried in this bill for the salary of the Vice-President.

Mr. LLOYD. I understand that; but certain appropriations are made for "the office of Vice-President," and there is no occasion for these appropriations unless they are intended for the office of the President of the Senate.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That appropriation applies, of course, to the office of the President of the Senate.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Allow me a question on the line propounded by my friend from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD]. Is there to be a permanent board of appeals in the Pension Bureau?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is in the Interior Department a permanent board of appeals.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now existing?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now existing. That board has been unable to keep up with the work, so that it is now more than two years behind. It is proposed to put on, for one year, 20 additional people, to bring up the arrears of work.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They will be clerks to the board of appeals?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; they will be members of the board.

If there be no further questions, I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentlemen state the number of increases of salary, and what they are?

Mr. HEMENWAY. By taking the report, the gentleman will find those increases specified under the several heads: for instance, in the Congressional Library, in the several Executive Departments, etc. The increases are very few, taking into consideration the fact that some three or four hundred increases of salary were asked for. The gentleman will find that very few increases of salary have been granted, and those only in cases where the committee thought the increases warranted.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT].

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, while in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I will submit some general remarks upon a question of vital importance to the people of my own State, in common with all the Southern States, and one that well might and ought to challenge the attention of the people of the whole nation as well.

I want to address myself to and direct my remarks against the several bills introduced by the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Mr. OLMSTED from Pennsylvania, and Mr. MOODY from Massachusetts, and in doing so I desire to be dispassionate, yet plain. These bills propose to cut down the representation from some of the Southern States, to investigate election laws, and otherwise interfere with the domestic affairs of our section of the country, just as if we were not 21 years of age; all of which I pronounce absolutely wrong, presumptuous, and unwarranted by any law of right, justice, or common sense, and we of the South are unable to understand why such things should be attempted in the face of the history of this our common country at this time, when it is to the best interest of all sections that peace and harmony should prevail and no apple of discord be thrown in our midst to disturb the present era of good feeling since the commencement of the Spanish war.

It seems to me it is only attributable to a want of broad statesmanship and a selfish and prejudiced spirit mixed up in the hearts of some, at least, with a certain amount of pure "cussedness," I like to have said, but that would be unparliamentary. Some people seem to think of the South as the members of a church advised the new preacher: One told him not to abuse the merchants in his sermons for they were very liberal toward the church; another told him not to abuse the lawyers for they also gave to the church, and another told him not even to be too hard on the saloon keepers for they, too, contributed; but all agreed in saying, "there's an old rich Jew living on the outskirts of town who won't give anything, anyway, and if you want to abuse anybody just give him hell and scissors and a heap of it." [Laughter.] Are not some of the Republicans disposed thus toward the South? Answer me gentlemen.

But let me ask if the South has not contributed in season and out of season her share of men, material, and resources from the beginning of this Government toward making this country what it has been in the past, what it is to-day, and is she not still contributing whatever she can to continue its greatness in the future? Important query and more important still the answer. History will bear me out in the statement that from the birth of the colonies, no section has done more for the country than the South. No section has done more to swell the thirteen little colonies, once hugging the rugged shores of the Atlantic with a population of only 3,000,000, to their present proportions, with a population of nearly 80,000,000 and almost boundless territory, spreading westward until golden harvests with nodding plumes greet the sun as he travels all the way from ocean to ocean, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Yes, the South has done her part well in all this march of progress, and should not be placed in the category of the much-cursed Jew, and Jews have their rights also, as well as other people, and there are many patriots amongst them.

Gentlemen of the House, do you not know that from Washington to Grant, a period of eighty years, Southern-born men filled the Presidency of the United States for fifty-seven of those years and Northern men for only twenty-three? Southern men led and controlled this country in the main through all the years of prosperity and happiness up to 1860. Every foot of territory from Virginia's princely gift of the great Northwest to the purchase of Alaska was under the administration of a Southern-born President and usually against the bitter opposition of the Northern States. In 1860 there was nearly as much, if not more, money invested in and as many, if not more, students attending Southern than Northern colleges, and the South was generally considered during this period the conservative balance wheel of the country in politics, education, and religion. During the dark days of 1776, when the flag of revolt was flung to the breeze against the black-hearted despotism of Great Britain, the South was not wanting in men and material, and responded gallantly and heroically to every call of her country in peace and in war, and more, is doing it to-day as manfully as ever.

It was the South that gave to this nation the sword of the Revolution, in the person of George Washington, under whose leadership, wise head, patriotic heart, and strong arm our forefathers achieved the glorious freedom and sweet peace we now enjoy. It was the South that gave to this nation the pen of the Revolution, in the person of Thomas Jefferson, who penned the immortal Declaration of Independence, and his memory will live as long as time shall last. It was the South that gave to this nation the tongue of the Revolution, in the person of Patrick Henry, who said "Give me liberty or give me death," the spirit that to-day animates the soul and inspires the heart of every son of the South, and will continue to inspire them till the end of time through all the centuries to come.

It was the South that gave to this nation the great expounder of the Constitution in the person of John Marshall, whose opinions are quoted throughout the land to-day, and it was the South that gave to this nation the greatest and most profound reasoner of his day in the person of John C. Calhoun, whose disquisition upon the organic law of the land stands yet unequaled and unanswered, and whose bones to-day repose quietly in Charleston, S. C., and upon whose tomb is written: "Truth, Justice, and the Constitution," emblematic words of our creed and faith to this day.

What marvelous wonders have been wrought in this broad land of ours during the last century under them! What wonderful growth in national life, in the advancement of science, art, knowledge, and wealth, have been accomplished by standing by them! And in all and through it all the South has always borne a conspicuous and active part and not one time found wanting. Then why should anyone be so prejudiced against our section as to wish the enactment of such measures as I have spoken of in the outset? Why should we not be left to attend to our own business in our own way, so that we may go ahead and help to make this country one of the grandest and greatest in the world? There must be some sinister and selfish motive behind the whole matter somewhere or somewhere else. Do the gentlemen behind these measures of hostility to the South want to charge us with the responsibility of African slavery? If so, we deny it.

History, if I have correctly read it, shows that after the first 20 slaves which the colonists of Jamestown bought from the Dutch ship, no negro was ever landed on these shores that was not brought in a ship of either Old or New England; that Virginia and Georgia made repeated protests against the introduction and perpetuation of slavery; that one of the counts against England which Jefferson had in the original draft of the Declaration of Independence was that she had forced slavery on the colonies against their will; that slavery existed in the Northern States first, and continued to exist there until they found that in their climate and amongst a manufacturing people it would not pay, and they then abolished it partially, not by any means on moral grounds, but on grounds purely commercial and for greed.

Then, instead of emancipating their slaves, they sold the greater part of them to the South for a large sum, and to the West Indies for rum, put the money in their pockets, drank and sold the rum and then began to shed great alligator tears about and to repent of the sin of slavery. Oh, ye Scribes and Pharisees! This tirade against slavery then assumed stupendous proportions, and the quaint, hypocritical cry against it began in earnest, especially as the South seemed to be growing rich and independent upon the strength of their newly made purchases. It is an historic fact that in a convention held in 1827, if I mistake not, for the purpose of considering the slave trade, it was continued for twenty years mainly by the voters of New England, whose ships were then monopolizing the very lucrative business.

This was done, too, as I understand, against the earnest protest of Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, Georgia, and other Southern States, so that it was authorized by law, to say the least of it. And slavery was so distinctly recognized by the Constitution of the United States, and the right of each State to regulate its own domestic affairs so plainly written, that we thought Congress violated the Constitution when it legislated against slavery as clearly as if it had passed laws against the factory labor of New England or the employment of white labor in the Northwest; and this was so distinctly recognized by the leaders of the Abolition party, seeing they could not get around it in any other way, except by defiance, that some of them denounced the Constitution as "a league with hell and a covenant with death," and professed to be governed by a higher law than the Constitution and laws of the country, thus boldly defying the plain law of the land. Daniel Webster, in a speech in 1837, if my memory serves me right, said that—

> Slavery was plainly guaranteed by the Constitution and ought to be carried out according to the intent and purpose of the same—or words to that effect.

But when they finally succeeded in abolishing it as they did, it could have been nothing more than the triumph of brute force over justice and right, using the plea of military necessity, which has only been for all time the plea of the freebooter through all the centuries past. Mr. Lincoln having said in his first inaugural address that he had no right under the Constitution to interfere with slavery in the States and no disposition to do so if he had the right, it seems to me that afterwards his emancipation proclamation was a plain violation of his oath to support the Constitution. Yet after all that has been said about the degradation, crime, and cruelty of slavery, for which you Northern people are directly responsible, and I here charge it, no laboring people in the world were ever better fed, clothed, or provided for than the negroes of the South, and Southern masters had so far performed their obligations to these slaves whom they bought from the North that they remained faithful through four years of war, and when freed in 1865 over 600,000 of them were members of the church. Then see what improvement the Southern people made upon your imported goods from Africa. Does this not prove beyond doubt that we can best manage these people in every way?

Thus the heathen savages whom New England greed had caught and brought from the jungles of Africa and sold into the South were so far improved in the hands of the Southerner that our Northern brethren deemed them fit to become citizens, to vote, and to hold office in the South, but not in the North; so that we believe we are still the best judges as to these questions, and we feel that we can still manage them without your help, after having made these reforms amongst them. However, you freed the negroes and the Southern people accepted the situation. When, by legislation, you made him a citizen and counted him as a basis of representation in the National Congress, we accepted the situation and are being represented in the lower House upon the basis made by yourselves, and now you seem to be haunted by your own ghost.

You then went a step further and made him a voter, giving him the privilege of manhood suffrage, which you knew then and know now he was never fit for, and we have even accepted that situation, but with the qualification that we would by means of constitutional restriction upon suffrage impose such regulations as our own domestic relations required, not alone upon the negro but all men; and behold you hold up your hands in holy horror and say he is disfranchised, while you know in most of the Northern States there exists restrictions upon the right to suffrage much more severe and drastic than can be found anywhere in the constitutions of the Southern States. A perusal of these will reveal it; and more, you will find that upon examination of the constitutions of the Southern States that the provisions contained therein have been fashioned after those of the Northern States, and in many cases word for word, and yet these sticklers condemn in the South what is openly approved in the North; and I will attempt to show before I conclude that the negro receives very little consideration in most of the Northern States—before the war, at least.

Then, if the South, according to history, is not responsible for slavery and the advocates of these measures do not desire their enactment on that account, let us ask if it is because the South has not stood squarely by the nation in her troubles with other countries, or, in other words, helped to fight her battles? Then let us see about that proposition. Let us take the Revolutionary war, the Mexican war, and the war with Spain and see the attitude of the Southern States. In this connection I have prepared a statement, with the figures, showing the relative number of troops furnished in these wars by the South and North in whole or in part, as well as by separate States. The figures speak for themselves. It is here shown the number of troops furnished by both sections collectively and by States. Study these figures for yourselves and see whether or not the South has helped to fight your battles. They are correct, as far as I have been able to get at the records. Being unable to find any regular statistics in regard to the war of 1812, which were not complete, I have not given them, but they would bear the same relative proportion. I will insert these figures here as part of my remarks without taking up the time to go over them, showing the different percentages, quotas, etc.

NUMBER OF TROOPS FURNISHED DURING THE WAR OF THE REVOLUTION BY THE SEVERAL STATES.

The exact number of men in the continental establishment furnished by each State in the war of the Revolution is not known, but an approximate estimate, made by Colonel Pierce, Paymaster-General of the Continental Army, and the Treasury accountants in 1787 is as shown in the first column of this table. In addition, however, all the States furnished regiments or independent battalions or companies of State troops, militia, rangers, riflemen, etc., for brief services, who were called out to assist the Continental Army in emergencies or were raised to protect and defend their own States, many of whom were in service at two or more different periods. The exact number thus furnished can not be given, but upon examination of various estimates I believe the figures shown in the second column of the table to be, in round figures, approximately correct.

The total here given is excessive as to the number that served in the Army, for many served two, three, and even four terms. Many of the men who entered the service in 1775 reentered in 1776, again in 1777, and again in 1780, and were therefore counted two, three, or four times, and from the best information attainable it is fair to assume that the number of individuals actually engaged in the military service during the war did not exceed 250,000.

By this statement it will be observed that the South, population considered, in each of the important wars inclusive of the Revolutionary war down to the present time did furnish relatively the largest percentage or quota of troops, thus evidencing her uniform patriotism in every war of importance.

Here is the percentage as shown by these figures in the Revolutionary, Mexican, and Spanish wars as to population and as to quota of troops furnished:

(a) War of Revolution.—Out of a total population in all the States of the Union, of say 3,929,214, that of the South was 1,792,710, contributing 7.64 per cent of the troops, as against a population in all the States of the Union other than the South of say 2,136,504, which latter, in all, contributed only 11.22 per cent.

(b) War with Mexico.—Of the whole population of the United States, of say 23,191,876, that of the South was 9,521,437, contributing 5 per cent of the troops, as against a population in all the States other than the South of say 13,670.439, which latter contributed only 4.72 per cent.

(c) Spanish-American War.—Out of a total population in all the States, of say 76,303,387, that of the South was 25,417,548, contributing 2.27 per cent, as against a population in all the States other than the South of 50,885,839, which latter contributed only 3.19 per cent.

War of Revolution.—Southern States contributed 36.35 per cent of troops.

War with Mexico.—Southern States contributed 42.47 per cent of troops.

War with Spain.—Southern States contributed 26.29 per cent of troops.

These figures abundantly show that no section of the Union has surpassed the South in valor and patriotism in time of national warfare. The annals of history abundantly substantiate this assertion. In calling the roll of the heroes of our early wars—the Revolution, the war of 1812, the Mexican war, the Algerine war, and the various Indian wars—the long list of Southern names can not fail to impress even the most casual observer with the fact that these names were the most active and prominent.

To this list South Carolina has contributed a quota that can not be excelled by any State, either in quantity or in quality. Witness the following, as they appear upon the roll of fame:

Gen. William Moultrie, who struck the first blow for American liberty in the South, in his magnificent defense of Charleston against the invading British fleet of nine men-of-war, attacking them with only 435 men from behind rude, half-finished bulwarks on Sullivans Island, fighting desperately all day and far into the night, and finally beating them off with terrible loss, so destructive was the patriot's fire and so determined were his men.

Gen. Francis Marion, the "Swamp Fox," who regained South Carolina from the British in 1779 by a series of rapid and brilliant guerrilla movements, the like of which has not been recorded in the annals of war in ancient or modern times.

Gen. Thomas Sumter, the "Blue Hen's Chicken," who cooperated with Marion and harried the enemy under Tarleton unmercifully, defeating them in battle after battle at Rockymount, Hanging Rock, Carey's Fort, etc. Tarleton called him a "gamecock always ready for a fight," and when the American general was wounded in one of the engagements Tarleton said:

I shall be very glad to learn that Sumter is in a condition to give us no further trouble. He certainly has been our greatest plague in this country.

Gen. Charles C. Pinckney and Col. Henry Laurens were two of Washington's most esteemed aids-de-camp and did valuable service at Brandywine, Germantown, Monmouth, Charleston, and on many other fields.

Admiral W. F. Shubrick did gallant service in the Constellation at the affair of Craney Island in the war of 1812, and in the Constitution during the latter part of the war.

Gen. John C. Frémont, the "Pathfinder," was of incalculable service in preventing California from falling into the hands of Mexico in the Mexican war by his masterly tactics with his almost incredibly small force of 60 or 70 men.

Passing over into Georgia, there looms up the heroic figure of Commodore Josiah Tatnall, who was on the Constellation at Craney Island, in the Algerine war, under Decatur; with Perry on Lake Erie; commanded the Spitfire in the bombardment of Vera Cruz, and in other Mexican engagements, and was in command of the East Indian squadron in the Chinese troubles in 1858, and went to the assistance of the hard-pressed British ships with the historic exclamation, "Blood is thicker than water." Also, there is Gen. David E. Twiggs, a leading figure in the Mexican war, and prominent at Palo Alto, Resaca, Monterey, etc. Also Gen. A. H. Colquitt (afterwards Senator), another brave officer in that war. Also Capt. Samuel Dale, the hero of the "canoe fight" in the Creek war of 1813; and Gens. Samuel Elbert and William McIntosh, famous officers in the Revolutionary war.

Florida was out of the calculation in those early days.

Alabama gave the country the services of Lieut. (now Senator) EDMUND W. PETTUS, Col. P. H. Raiford, Gen. Goode Byran, and other distinguished officers in the Mexican war.

Mississippi furnishes three brilliant names in Gen. F. L. Claiborne, who commanded in the Creek war; Gen. John A. Quitman, who won many laurels at Monterey, Vera Cruz, and especially at Chapultepec; and Col. Jefferson Davis, whose record in the Mexican war was most enviable, and who by his bravery, especially at Buena Vista, where he was severely wounded, won at last the good will of his father-in-law, Gen. Zachary Taylor. General Taylor had always opposed his daughter's marriage to Davis, but after this battle he told her that she had proved a better judge of men than he. All honor to Jeff Davis, the great Confederate chieftain, who served well in the field and on the forum.

The same war developed a group of brave and eminent officers from the far Southwest—Gen. Persifor F. Smith and Col. W. S. Harney, from Louisiana; General Henderson and the renowned Col. (afterwards Gen.) Albert Sidney Johnston, from Texas, and Col. John S. Roane and Colonel Yell, of Arkansas, the latter of whom was killed while gallantly leading his troops to victory at Buena Vista.

Turning east again, we reach Tennessee, which proudly claims Gen. Andrew Jackson, the hero of New Orleans; Gen. Samuel Houston, the leader of the successful Texas revolutionists; Gen. Edmund P. Gaines, who won imperishable fame by his glorious defense of Fort Erie on August 14, 1814, and Gen. Gideon J. Pillow, one of the bravest of the leaders in the Mexican war at Monterey, Vera Cruz, Churubusco, Chapultepec, etc.

Kentucky, always a land of fighters, has given us, first and foremost, Gen. Zachary Taylor, prominent in the war of 1812, the Black Hawk war of 1832, the Seminole war of 1837, and the Mexican war, winning the victories at Palo Alto, Resaca, Monterey, and other battles, and the culminating victory of Buena Vista, where the chagrined Mexican general, Santa Ana, said that Taylor had been thrice beaten and did not know it, and where Taylor's remarks were confined to such sentences as "A little more grape, Captain Bragg." Kentucky also furnished Col. Richard M. Johnson, one of Harrison's right-hand men in the "Tecumseh" campaign, and a mighty factor at the battle of the Thames, with his invincible "Mounted Kentuckians." Also Maj. George Croghan, whose heroic defense of Fort Stephenson at Sandusky was the first gleam of success in the Northwest in that war. Gen. William O. Butler and Col. John S. Williams were two gallant Kentuckians in the Mexican war.

North Carolina gave us Gens. James Moore and Robert Howe, two of the most efficient officers of the Revolutionary army. Gen. Joseph Lane, a grand fighter at Buena Vista and in other Mexican battles, was a native of North Carolina.

Virginia has ample reason to "point with pride." First among the Virginians stands Gen. George Washington, who needs no detailed description. Nor is any needed by Gen. Winfield Scott, the veteran of five wars, the Commander in Chief in three, and the hero of Chippewa, Lundys Lane, Cerro Gordo, Puebla, Vera Cruz, Contreras, Churubusco, Molino del Rey, and Chapultepec. Among other eminent Virginians was Col. Henry Lee, who, though only 19 years of age at the outbreak of the Revolution, did most brilliant service throughout that war.

The surprise and capture of the British garrison at Paulus Hook without the loss of a man was perhaps his most signal feat. His renowned son, Gen. Robert E. Lee, won no less fame in the Mexican war, gaining brevet after brevet at Cerro Gordo, Contreras, Churubusco, and Chapultepec. Gen. Joseph E. Johnston won equal renown in Mexico, at Cerro Gordo, Molino del Rey, and Chapultepec. Other distinguished Virginians were, Gens. Hugh Mercer and Horatio Gates in the Revolution, and Col. George Armistead, the defender of Fort McHenry in the war of 1812, when the morning's dawn showed that "our flag was still there."

Maryland also has a brilliant roster, including Gens. Otho H. Williams and Mordecai Gist, who displayed great bravery and skill in the southern campaigns in the Revolution; Maj. Samuel Ringgold, who fell at Palo Alto; Gen. Nathan Towson, the leading artillerist of the war of 1812, whose guns played havoc with the enemy at Black Rock, Chippewa, and Lundy's Lane; and a quartet of gallant tars that it would be hard to beat—Commodore Stephen Decatur, the glorious commander of the Chesapeake and the President, and the victor in the Algerine war; Commodore Joshua Barney, conspicnous in the defense of Washington in 1812; Commodore John Rodgers, the captor of the Highflyer and various other British vessels in 1813, and Capt. Jesse D. Elliott, second in command under Perry on Lake Erie, and who received Perry on board the Niagara after the abandonment of the Lawrence.

Delaware is not far behind in naval glory, with her Capt. Jacob Jones, whose Wasp took the British Frolic so handily early in the struggle of 1812, and Commodore Thomas Macdonough, who, commanding the Saratoga in the battle of Lake Champlain, won one of the most complete naval victories on record.

I have only touched the high bumps along, as the traveler said, in this historical sketch; or, as the man said when tied to his bull yearling by a rope, as the animal was rushing along with him at breakneck speed, a neighbor says, "John where are you going?" "Damn if I know; ask the bull." [Laughter.]

In the war for Texan independence Southern blood flowed freely. An especial instance being in the war for Texan independence, so evidenced by the report, in the American Encyclopedia, of the Alamo, a fort in Bexar County, Tex., near San Antonio, on the left bank of the San Antonio River, celebrated in the Texan war for independence. It was an oblong structure, about an acre in extent, surrounded by a wall 8 or 10 feet high and 3 feet thick. Gen. Sam Houston had caused San Antonio to be dismantled, upon which Santa Ana, with a large attachment of his army, invested Fort Alamo February 23, 1836.

The Texans, consisting only of 140 men commanded by Col. William Barrett Travis, retired into the fort, while the Mexicans, 4,000 strong, after taking possession of the town, erected batteries on both sides of the river and bombarded the fort without cessation for twenty-four hours. During this time over 200 shells were discharged into the fort, yet not a man was injured, while the Texan sharpshooters, standing upon the ramparts, were able to pick off man after man of the enemy. Several assaults were now made, but in every instance the Mexicans were repulsed with loss. Colonel Travis repeatedly sent couriers to San Felipe asking for assistance, but only 32 men succeeding in forcing their way through the Mexican lines and reaching the garrison. By March 3 scarcity of provisions, combined with constant watching, had undermined the health of the men without, however, affecting their spirits.

Before daybreak on the 6th a combined attack was made by the whole Mexican force. Twice assaulting, they were twice driven back with severe loss. The Texans, unable to load in a hand-to-hand fight which now ensued, clubbed their rifles and fought with desperation until but six of their band remained alive. These, including Colonel Crockett, surrendered to Castrillion under promise of protection, but being taken before Santa Ana they were by his orders instantly cut to pieces. Colonel Crockett fell, stabbed by a dozen swords. Colonel Bowie, ill in bed, was then shot after having killed several of his assailants. Major Evans was shot while in the act of firing the powder magazine.

The bodies of the slain were collected in the center of the Alamo, and after being horribly mutilated, in which act it is said Santa Ana and his generals joined, they were burned. But three persons—a woman, a child, and a servant—were spared. The Mexican loss was 1,600. The massacre of the Alamo was followed by the battle of San Jacinto, the defeat of the whole Mexican army, and the capture of Santa Ana himself with his best generals. At this last battle the Texans, with the war cry "Remember the Alamo," carried all before them. Colonel Travis was from South Carolina, and also two other Carolinians—Bonham and Bowie—perished there. Yet some men seem to think that nothing good can come out of Nazareth—nothing good can come out of the South.

I would like to remind them again that the great "Father of his Country," "the first in war, the first in peace, and the first in the hearts of his countrymen," came from the South. There were Thomas Jefferson, Virginia; Nathaniel Macon, North Carolina; J. H. Gilliard, South Carolina; Thomas Newton, Virginia; Thomas H. Benton, Missouri; William R. King, Alabama; Dixon H. Lewis, Alabama; John C. Calhoun, South Carolina; Robert Y. Haynes, South Carolina; George McDuffie, South Carolina; William C. Preston, South Carolina; Charles Pinckney, South Carolina; John Mildege, Georgia; James Jackson, Georgia; Henry Clay, Kentucky; John J. Crittenden, Kentucky; John Randolph, Virginia; William H. Crawford, Georgia; Andrew Jackson, Tennessee; John Sevier, Tennessee; Benjamin Fitzpatrick, Alabama; Howell Cobb, Georgia; Robert Toombs, Georgia; and a host of other names from the South and West interwoven with the history of the United States in times of peace as well as in war who had a hand in the legislation which gave grandeur to the nation in the good old times, and their works are inseparably connected with the prosperous times of this country, and it is due these names, together with many other good names from the North, that they should receive something more at the hands of some of our bitter, sectional Republicans than scathing anathemas of hate and prejudice.

Peace be to their ashes, and glory to the works they have left behind them, and I stand here to defend them. These men have contributed very largely to whatever influences have gone toward making this nation what it is, and their descendants, from their time to the present, have done likewise, and will continue to do so, if not prevented by the wavers of the bloody shirt, who seem to think, as the church members thought about the Jew, that the South deserves nothing but "Hell and scissors." [Laughter.] As I have already said, the Jews have rights which should be respected, as well as other people, and I do not here disparage their race at all in relating this little anecdote as an illustration.

Well, then, it may be that some say that the South is to be further chastised for the civil war and the part she took in it. Possibly it is charged that we fought to destroy the Union. If that is charged, I deny it, and I will insert here and indorse the words uttered by the Hon. CHARLES E. HOOKER, of Mississippi, in a speech upon this subject upon the floor of the House a few days ago. He said in substance:

I do not wish it to go down to posterity that the object of the men who withdrew from the House and Senate when the Confederate government was established to raise the armies for the maintenance of the independence of the South were animated by a desire to destroy the fundamental principle which lies at the very basis of the Constitution of the United States. They believed that the rights and interests of the people of the South were jeopardized by Mr. Lincoln and the party that elected him, and they believed that the Government was originally founded by the assent of the States.

They referred to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that when the Government of the United States, at the expiration of the Revolutionary war, was inaugurated by the original thirteen States, that it was a government predicated upon the great principle of State rights and community independence. It was for this that they made the declaration. It was for that that they fought the four years' war of the Confederacy. Am I right or wrong when I say that history defends our action? The original thirteen States framed the government which was to become the government over the States which ratified it, if nine States ratified it; and then by the very declaration of the Constitution itself it was to become a government only over the States so ratifying the same. Five States of the original thirteen, including North Carolina and three others, for a long time refused to accede to the Government of the United States. They finally did so, and it became the government over thirteen States, and the language of the Constitution was that it was to be a government "only over the States so ratifying the same."

The people of the South believed that their rights were jeopardized. They appealed to the great principles which laid at the foundation of the Constitution of 1789, which was the principle of home rule and a community independence. When we had this war it was not for the destruction of that great cardinal principle, but for its preservation. And when the war closed and the Government had to be again reorganized, and these Southern States again to be brought into the Union, how was it done, Mr. Chairman? Not by force of the Government, not by the bayonet and sword, but it was done by the consent of the people in convention assembled. They therefore did not make war upon the principles which lay at the foundation of the Federal Constitution, but they made the war to maintain those principles, to defend and not destroy them.

I want the truth of history to be written, not in the spirit of laudation of one side and abuse of the other, but I want it to be written in the light of history, which will show how the government was originally framed and what was the purpose and object of the men who served in the Confederate army. It was an army organized to preserve the great and vital principles of the Constitution. It was a government founded on those principles, and when the Confederate constitution came to be adopted in Montgomery, and the government finally established at Richmond, they adopted the very same principles, only they specified with more particularity some of the grounds on which that Constitution was adopted. And when the war closed and this rehabilitation had to occur, it was decided by the court of highest resort—by that tribunal to whose decision we bow—that this was originally a government founded upon the consent of the States; that it was a government of free and independent States, based upon the action of the States, and that it was not a government of force and power. And hence it was that every State in the Union that was in the Federal Government furnished its soldiers under that principle of the Constitution mentioned in the decision of the Supreme Court that this was "an indissoluble Union, based on free and independent and indestructible States."

If the States had to yield to the superior force it did not render less sacred the great principles for which they were struggling. It was as old as the history of the English-speaking people, and extended back to the time when our ancestors made the declaration of rights and passed the Bill of Rights, and in our own country to the time when our ancestors assembled in Philadelphia and declared that it was a government for the protection of the interests of the people of the States; that the colonies were and of right ought to be free and independent States. It was to maintain that great principle that the government of the Confederacy was formed and her soldiers fought for it, not for the destruction of the great principles of the Constitution, because they had to be reverted to when we came to reorganize our Government after the war.

At first it was attempted to do this by sending military satraps to the Southern States to be governors over us with an armed force. That was a failure. The reconstruction laws were a failure. It was found that there was no way of reorganizing this Government and bringing back the Confederate States under the Government except by the consent of those States as expressed in their conventions. And thus we stand to-day—reunited, because we were struggling for the great principles of home rule and community independence, and not to destroy the cardinal and essential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Constitution of 1789, which is now the Constitution of the United States of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This sentiment I indorse, every word of it. I believe with this distinguished gentleman that we were only exercising our rights under the Constitution when we proposed peaceably to withdraw from the Union, and then a war of coercion was forced upon us, and nothing was left us but to fight, and "'twere better to fight and lose than not to have fought at all."

Yes, we were defending our homes and our firesides from an invading army. Secession was not treason, and could not be made to so appear. Other sections of this country had agitated the question long before this.

Mr. FOX. May I interrupt the gentleman from South Carolina to ask him a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly, my friend, if your question is not too long, as my time is limited.

Mr. FOX. I would ask the gentleman if he can mention an instance when secession was agitated before that time?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes. I will mention several instances from memory just now. So early as 1842, there was a convention of the New England States held at Hartford, Conn., to consider the advisability of seceding from the Union, and I believe concluded that they had the right under the Constitution to withdraw if their rights were trampled upon or their interests in any way jeopardized, and even threatened to do so unless some things were changed, I belive, in regard to taxation. John Quincy Adams in that year, while a member of the lower House of Congress from Massachusetts, presented to that body a series of petitions signed by a number of his constituents looking toward a withdrawal from the Union. Whereupon, a resolution of censure was offered against him for doing so, but after a long running debate, lasting several days, he vindicated himself before the House and came out victorious, the resolution failing by a large vote.

An account of this transaction may be found in the RECORD, then called the Globe, in the year 1842, during the second session of the Twenty-seventh Congress. Adams was upheld and sustained, at least, by long odds, so that secession even can not be laid at the door of the South. The Southern people only availed themselves of what they considered, under the organic law of the land, to be their right and privilege—that of peaceably withdrawing from the Union—and we have no apology to offer to anybody or any section for such action. And under the same conditions, surrounded by the same circumstances and environments, which will probably never occur any more—and God grant it may not—we would pursue the same course again. Now, this is not said in any vainglorious or boasting manner, but only to maintain what we believe to be our own rights as we understand the Constitution and laws of the country, and we have rights as well as others. Rhode Island was the last State to adopt the Constitution, and she did not do it till she reserved the right to withdraw if she saw proper under certain conditions.

For making this assertion in a speech in the Fifty-fourth Congress a resolution of censure was offered by Mr. Barrett, a member from Massachusetts, against me; but after a running debate and discussion the matter was dropped and the resolution never heard of any more, and I was vindicated. An account of this may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress. Then, the charge of treason against Jefferson Davis was never brought to issue, from the fact that no tribunal could ever have established treason against him under the Constitution of the nation and its powers, for he was no more of a traitor than Robert Lee or any private Confederate soldier.

Then when we come to consider the unanimity with which the South responded to the call of the President for troops to fight in the Spanish war, those who wore the gray marching side by side with those who wore the blue, it was to have been hoped that no legislation would have been proposed here that would tend to revive bitterness or reopen those old wounds. It will do no good. It can do no good, but only result in harm to every section of the country—even the discussion of such propositions. And it comes to the surface, then, that the only reason given for such interference in our domestic affairs down South by the Crumpacker bill and others, proposing, arbitrarily, to strike down a part of the representation upon the floor of this House of four of the sovereign States of this Union, is because, forsooth, those States are unwilling that the honest administration of their local affairs shall be again conducted by the rule of vice, corruption, venality, and ignorance. We do not want any more experience along that line and do not intend to have it.

We had enough of this bitter cup during the dark days of reconstruction; we never intend to swallow it again, and we feel that there is no power on earth that can make us do it. The logical end of such legislation as is proposed by such Olmsted and Moody resolutions and the Crumpacker bill and others like it is negro domination in the South or hell on earth for white men. It means the return of the rule of the carpetbagger and the negro and scalawag, when every office in most of the Southern States was filled by despicable, loathsome agents of the demon of darkness and corruption; men who had not known us when they came and planted their feet upon our soil and set up their wrongful claims to govern us; men whose only desire before and since the war was to rob and plunder honest people, reveling, as it were, in the green filthiness of their stolen prey, rendering the air even and everything around them too putrid for anything else to breed except vice and those money-mongering human maggots themselves, from the scent and scenes of which a decent dog would have turned away to vomit.

He who would undertake to place the Southern people, who are just as loyal to-day as any other section of this country, in that condition again, is no more entitled to our honest consideration than the midnight assassin who would enter your house at midnight, plunge a dagger to your heart, and rob you of your goods, and carry them off as his own. No man can have our esteem and respect who would attempt it either here or elsewhere.

Gentlemen of the House, those of you who would pass legislation here that would have such a tendency if you would, certainly do not properly understand the conditions confronting us, nor can you have a proper conception of the horrors of carpetbag rule in the South from 1870 to 1876.

While Sherman's march through Georgia—burning barns and homes, slaughtering work horses and stealing cattle, leaving people stripped and naked—and his march to the sea, through South Carolina, with the many acts of cruelty, brutality, and robbery, leaving the people without shelter or food to perish, together with the cowardly burning of Columbia and Atlanta, and other towns, villages, and homes, insulting and leaving defenseless the women and children, are still in their memories, with all its attendant infamy, ruffianism, cowardice, destruction, desolation, and damnation, it is less distasteful and horrible, if it be possible, to our people than the ten years' reign of the carpetbagger, scalawag, and negro, with all its awful, direful, and infernal recollections.

I do not believe that a large number of the more conservative Republicans will vote for these measures. I believe they will rise above passion and prejudice and view the matter from the light of broader statesmanship and be more just to a long-suffering people who, as I have before said, are as loyal to the flag to-day of a reunited country as those of any other section of this great country. Has not the war with Spain yielded its full harvest of results? Ought it not have hushed the loud clamor of sectional voices and brought our country into harmony of sentiment and action? Ought it not to have blotted out all divisions and destroyed all prejudices? The sons of men who faced each other in the red blaze of battle in the war between the States have clasped hands over the bloody chasm, buried the bloody shirt, and are now marching side by side, keeping step to martial music, ready to dare and to die for the same flag and the same country.

Yet the Crumpacker bill proposes to take from the State of Louisiana 2 of her Representatives, reducing her from 6 to 4; from Mississippi, 3, reducing her from 7 to 4; from North Carolina, 4, reducing her from 9 to 5, and from South Carolina, 3, reducing her from 7 to 4. Now, why is it proposed to do this, I have asked? Simply because these States have endeavored to protect themselves by constitutions and constitutional amendments against a return of such conditions as I have described above, from a return to power of those who feasted and fattened upon our people during the reconstruction period, destroying our credit and business and disgracing our institutions. That is the reason we find, and nothing more. Strange as it may appear, the constitutions of these four States are fashioned after those of the North. Take the constitution of my own beloved little State of South Carolina and compare it with that of New York, Massachusetts, Ohio, Connecticut, and many others of the States north of Mason and Dixon's line, and what do you find? You will find their constitutions more restrictive of the suffrage than South Carolina's ever dared to be. Now, let us examine the laws of some of the Northern States and compare them as I said in the outset, as I have collated them from a speech delivered by a distinguished Senator at the other end of the Capitol upon this subject, the late Senator George, of Mississippi, in the Fifty-first Congress, second session.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have no desire to disarrange the plan of the gentleman's speech or his argument, but I would like to ask him this question—whether he recognizes the fourteenth amendment as a part of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. TALBERT. I am not here to stand a civil-service examination individually, and will refer the gentleman to the constitution of South Carolina, but I want to say that I hold in my hand here statistics on this subject, or rather information, from other States along this line, and I find that Indiana, neither before nor since the war, has paid any more attention to the rights of the negro than other States, and hardly as much.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would like to have a more definite answer to my question whether the gentleman recognizes the fourteenth amendment as a binding part of the Constitution.

Mr. TALBERT. The constitution of South Carolina conforms to all the articles of the Constitution and all the amendments. The gentleman may take the constitution of the State of South Carolina and he can not find a single scratch of the pen that is in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States, and that is sufficient answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that local legislation in a great many of the States has disfranchised a large percentage of the male inhabitants over 21 years of age?

Mr. TALBERT. I assert, and the statement will be sustained by examination, that the laws of the States north of Mason and Dixon's line are much more restrictive and severe in respect to suffrage than those of the South, and the gentleman should inquire in that direction, and I advise him to sweep before his own door before he comes to mine.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman must understand that he must not stand up here and attempt to put words in my mouth. I must be allowed to answer in my own way, as I am accustomed to do in other things.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg the pardon of the genial gentleman, who, I thought, in the beginning of his remarks, announced his disposition to be fair and dispassionate——

Mr. TALBERT. I still desire to be fair, and will say that you can take the constitution of South Carolina and I defy you to point out anything that discriminates against the white man or the black man or any other man, but you will find it, as I have stated, absolutely fair and impartial to everybody, and I will say to the gentleman that I had the honor of having a hand in making that instrument.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not claim that the constitution of South Carolina discriminates in terms against any race or any class of citizens; but I do claim that it has substantially disfranchised all the colored population.

Mr. TALBERT. I can not allow my time to be consumed in this way, but will say that all those who are qualified vote and those who are not do not vote.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Just one moment——

Mr. TALBERT. I must decline to be further interrupted, as I find my time is limited——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg pardon for interrupting the gentleman, and will say that he is at perfect liberty to strike out this interruption when he prints his remarks. I am reluctant to inject any argument of mine into the belly of the gentleman's speech.

Mr. TALBERT. I am obliged to the gentleman, but I do not care anything about his remarks although not very ornate; but now let us see what some of these laws are in the Northern States.

I will now speak of some of the constitutions and laws of the other Northern States, as said in the beginning of my remarks. Let us see what are some of the laws of the State of Massachusetts. In the revision of the laws of Massachusetts of 1814 I find that—

Negroes were not allowed to be enrolled in the militia, but they were required to attend the calls of the militia companies and to do such work as might be required of them by the officers.

I also find that—

Negroes and mulattoes were prohibited from entertaining any negro or mulatto servants under a penalty of 5 shillings for each offense, and if any were unable to pay the fine he was to work in the house of correction at hard labor for two days for each shilling of the fine.

I again find a statute in 1814, a preamble—

That great charge and inconvenience have occurred in divers towns by releasing and setting free negro and mulatto slaves.

I find this law—

That no such persons shall be freed until the bond and security be first given to indemnify the town against such negro or mulatto becoming a charge on the town.

Then, on page 748 of same book, it is also a law—

That if a negro or mulatto shall strike any person of the English or other Christian nation he shall be punished by a severe whipping at the discretion of the justice.

No jury trial was allowed to the negro. At that time these persons of the African race were not even entitled to the right of a trial by jury, but if one of them should strike an Englishman or any other man of a Christian nation he was to be whipped at the public whipping post at the discretion of the justice.

And at the same place it is enacted that no one of the English, Scotch, or other Christian nation shall intermarry with a negro or mulatto, and a penalty of £50 is imposed on any minister who shall solemnize such a marriage. In the compilation of the statutes of 1836 intermarriage between whites and blacks is again prohibited. It may be well to add that negroes were excluded from militia service in Massachusetts until the year 1852.

These things are not mentioned for the purpose of bringing any opprobrium upon that great State whatever. I only want to show here, where there was not one black man to every 1,000 white persons, these things were deemed essential for the preservation of the good order and the liberties and safety of the people of the State of Massachusetts.

Now, let us take Rhode Island:

In the revision of the statutes of 1822, page 371, intermarriage between whites and blacks was prohibited, and such a marriage was declared void. This provision was continued in the revision of 1857, and also in the revision of 1872, eight years after the war closed, and a person joining such a person in marriage was liable to a fine of $200. Whites only allowed to vote—

In Rhode Island, as in Connecticut, the right of a negro to vote came from the adoption of the fifteenth amendment, and not from any act of those States.

I will say here also that, during the war or soon after the war, and before the fifteenth amendment was adopted, a proposition was submitted to the people of Connecticut to enfranchise the negro and make a voter of him, and that proposition was voted down. It was also done in Ohio and Wisconsin and in Illinois, and possibly in some of the other States. The people of these States determined each for themselves that the negro was unfit for political power. This was done, too, in cool moments, with no excitement or passion, and yet nothing is said about it.

In Little Rhody again—

The granting of license for keeping of taverns, alehouses, victualing houses, cook shops, oyster shops, and for retailing liquors was prohibited—to any colored or black person, nor shall any white person, duly licensed, suffer any black or colored person in his employ or his agent to sell any liquor whatever, under penalty of forfeiting such license.

In these exact words—

Here is the judgment of the State of Rhode Island, as late, at least, as the year 1822, that the negroes were unfit for the right of suffrage, that they were not allowed to participate in the business of the country. They could not keep a boarding house; they could not keep a restaurant; they could not keep even a cake shop; they could not keep a fish and ice store, and they could not keep a place for retailing liquors. Not only that, but a white man having a business of some kind was not allowed to have a negro barkeeper. Yet you have not said a word about this treatment of the negro in Rhode Island. In the same book, on page 444, there is a law to this effect:

If any free negro or mulatto shall keep a disorderly house or entertain any person at unseasonable hours or in an extravagant manner, the town council may break up the housekeeping of such negro or mulatto and bind him out to serve two years.

Gentlemen of the House, that was the judgment of the enlightened, the conservative, the liberty-loving people of this State.

Slavery was abolished in Rhode Island in 1784, but the children of slaves were continued under the control of their owners until they were 21 years of age. By the constitution of 1842 only citizens of the United States were allowed to vote. This excluded negroes, as they were not citizens then.

This was a decision by the supreme court of the State of Connecticut, and afterwards by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott case.

In Connecticut, then, we see that—

Slavery was abolished in 1784 by declaring free all born of slave mothers after that time, but their children were born to serve their owners until the age of 25 years. Those born before were continued in slavery. (See Jackson v. Bullock, 2 Conn. Reports, 38.) In revision of 1821, only whites were allowed to vote.

We further find that in this State—

The amended constitution of 1845 contains the same provision, and this provision remains in words in the constitution of Connecticut up to the present time.

The date of this compilation from which this is taken is the year 1875.

A negro can not vote in Connecticut except by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. The State constitution prohibits it.

In the revision of 1839 negroes were prohibited from serving in the militia, and in the revision of 1849 and in the revision of 1866, this provision having been left out only in the revision of the year 1875. So much for the status of the negro in the great State of Connecticut up to the present time.

Only whites are allowed to serve in the militia. This provision continued in the revision of 1840 and the revision of 1850, and left out in the revision of 1870.

In New Hampshire whites only were allowed in the militia in the revision of 1853. In Maine marriages between whites and negroes were prohibited.

In Pennsylvania we find that—

Negroes and mulattoes were excluded from militia duty until 1872. The fifteenth amendment did not apply to serving in the militia. It only applied to voting. So Pennsylvania allowed the poor negroes to be excluded from serving in the militia until 1872. They were not allowed to serve on a jury up to that time. Whites only were allowed to vote until 1870—that is, under the fifteenth amendment.

As to New Jersey:

Act passed February, 1820, made free every child born of a slave since July 4, 1804, but provided that such child should remain the servant of the owner of his or her mother, as if bound to service by the overseers of the poor until the male children were 28 and the female 21 years of age.

This is found in the revision of 1847, I believe:

On the 18th of April, 1846, an act was passed to abolish slavery finally, and every slave then in the State was made free; but every such freedman was made apprentice to his then owner, who was only allowed to discharge him from service by securing the certificates of the overseers of the poor and of two justices that such apprentice proposed to be freed was of sound mind and capable of making a support, or without such certificate, if the owner would give bond, with security, that the negro would not become a charge to the county.

That was the New Jersey plan. They freed the negro, but required the owner to hold him except upon proof of his capacity to take care of himself. In this manner New Jersey disposed of the business.

The children of these apprentices were to be supported by their masters till they were 6 years old, and then, in all cases, they were to be bound as poor children by overseers of the poor, the owner having the preference. Persons enticing away such apprentices were declared guilty of a misdemeanor and fined $100, and persons harboring such apprentices were made liable to pay $1 for each day they so harbored them.

Only whites were allowed to be enrolled in the militia and only whites were entitled to vote. (See the constitution of 1847, art. 2).

This constitution, as far as I have been able to learn, has not been changed.

Now comes the great State of Ohio, the generous gift of grand old Virginia to the United States:

Act passed in 1804 prohibited, after June 1 of that year, any black or mulatto persons from settling or residing in the State without a certificate of freedom; any person employing such a person without certificate shall be fined from $10 to $50. In 1807 an act was passed prohibiting any negro or mulatto from settling in the State unless he shall, within twenty days after his arrival, give bond, with two or more freehold sureties, in the penalty of $500, conditioned for the good behavior of such negro or mulatto and to pay for his support in case he shall be unable to support himself; and if any negro or mulatto shall immigrate into the State without complying with the above, it was made the duty of the overseer of the poor to remove him as a pauper. And if any person shall employ, harbor, or conceal such negro or mulatto, and who has not complied with the above, he shall forfeit $100 and be liable to support the same in case he becomes unable to do so.

This is the way Ohio regarded the freedman. She would not allow him to come within her borders unless he would give bond and security that he would not become a charge upon the county. This act was passed in 1807, but was continued in force, I believe, because I see the revision of 1847 cites the place in which you could find the law. It must have been in force up to that time.

In the same act a negro or mulatto was an incompetent witness in any case in which a white person was interested.

The constitution of Ohio, in force when the war ended, confined the right to vote to whites.

And when the proposition was submitted to the people of Ohio, just after the war, to strike out that clause of the Constitution prohibiting negroes from voting, it was voted down by a great majority.

In 1859 an act was passed directing the judges of election to reject all voters who had a distinct and visible admixture of African blood. Judges receiving such votes were made liable to a fine from $100 or $500 and to imprisonment from one to six months; and any person aiding or advising such voting was made liable to imprisonment.

In 1861 an act was passed prohibiting any person of pure white blood from intermarrying or having illicit carnal intercourse with any negro or with any person having a distinct and visible admixture of African blood, under a penalty of a fine of $100 and imprisonment for six months.

In 1868, the very year in which General Grant was elected, the very year in which these reconstructed constitutions were forced upon the people of the Southern States, Ohio passed a law containing severe provisions against negro voting.

Negroes were not allowed to serve as jurors, and the prohibition was in force in 1868.

Now, let us see about Indiana:

By statute (see revision of 1831, page 375) free negroes were prohibited from settling in the State, unless bond and security for $100 in each case was given that he should not become a charge on the county as a pauper, and it was provided that if the negro was convicted of any penal offense (however trivial, as an affray or gaming) the whole bond was forfeited.

A negro settling in the State and failing to give bond was to be hired out by a public officer for six months, unless he removed from the State, and any person hiring or harboring such a negro was liable to be fined $1,000.

A negro or mulatto having one-fourth negro blood could not be a witness for or against a white person.

By the first constitution of Indiana, adopted in 1816, only whites were allowed to vote and only whites could be in the militia.

(Article 7, section 11.) Marriages between whites and blacks were prohibited, and if such persons should go out of the State to marry the marriage was void. Whites and blacks or mulattoes intermarrying were liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary from one to ten years, and all persons aiding in or advising such marriage were punishable in the same way, and any person concealing or harboring whites and negroes who had intermarried, with intent to prevent their detection and punishment, were punishable in the penitentiary from one to five years.

No want of religious belief in whites was a ground to exclude them as witnesses, but blacks and mulattoes were excluded in cases for or against whites. This provision was in force at least as late as 1862.

The constitution of Indiana made in 1851, and still remaining as then written at least as late as 1870, prohibits negroes and mulattoes from voting; and article 13 of that constitution prohibits negroes and mulattoes from moving to and settling in the State; and that constitution makes void all contracts made with negroes and mulattoes so coming into the State, and punishes all persons employing them or encouraging them to settle in the State by a fine of from $50 to $500.

So if a negro should evade the law and should slip into the State of Indiana he was an outlaw; he was not allowed to make any contract for any purpose whatever. There he had no showing whatever indeed.

Go to Illinois. We find some very interesting reading in Illinois, a State which gave us General Grant and Mr. Lincoln.

At an early day Illinois prohibited negroes and mulattoes from settling in the State unless they had certificates of freedom and unless each settler should give bond in the penalty of $1,000, with good security, that he would not become a charge upon the county as a pauper, and that he would at all times demean himself according to law, and any person hiring or giving sustenance to a negro or mulatto settling in the State in violation of this law was liable to a fine of $500. (Revised statutes of Illinois of 1829.)

Marriages between whites and blacks or mulattoes were prohibited, and persons violating the statute on the subject were to be whipped with 39 lashes and imprisoned for one year, and persons solemnizing such marriages, or granting licenses therefor, were to be fined $300 and to be thereafter ineligible to hold office in that State. This was continued in the revision of 1845.

In revised statutes of 1883 the same provision as to settling in the State of free negroes will be found.

In the constitution of Illinois, by which the State was admitted into the Union, slavery was abolished, but the apprenticing and binding out of negro servants was authorized. Under this constitution there were many stringent and severe provisions enacted to secure the rights of the master to the apprentice and to his labor, and to enforce subordination of negroes and mulattoes. These will be found in the revision of 1833, commencing on page 457. Among them is a prohibition against any negro or mulatto being brought into the State to be set free without bond and security in $1,000 given to indemnify to counties against the negro becoming a pauper. Free negroes were also required to have certificates of freedom.

Any negro servant being lazy, disorderly, or guilty of misbehavior to his master or his family was punishable with stripes, and if he refused to work he was to be compelled thereto in like manner; and, moreover, was compelled to serve, after his term had expired, two days for every one he had refused to work. And if he ran away he was also compelled to pay, after his term was out, all expense of catching and bringing him home. He was allowed to acquire goods and money only, not real estate; nor was he allowed to trade in any commodity without the consent of his master.

These bound or apprenticed servants were also punishable in all cases by whipping, when free persons were punishable by fine.

They fined the white man and whipped the negro.

This provision was continued in the revision of 1845, and a person permitting slaves or servants of color, to the number of three or more, to assemble at his or her house for the purpose of dancing or reveling was fined $20 and costs, and the slaves or servants put in jail and whipped. This was continued in the revision of 1845.

Apprentices were also required to be taught to read, write, and to know arithmetic; but a colored apprentice was only to be taught to read. This provision continued in revision of 1858.

Negroes were not allowed to be witnesses for or against whites.

In revision of 1845, keepers of public houses were prohibited from entertaining these servants, negroes, or mulattoes, and the provision against their being witnesses where white men were interested was continued, with the enactment that a mulatto having one-fourth negro blood should be excluded, and Indians were only excluded if they had half Indian blood.

So it appears that an Indian was just twice as good as a negro in the State of Illinois at that time.

And in same revision no negro or mulatto was permitted to reside in the State without a certificate of his freedom, and without giving bond and surety, in the penalty of $1,000, against his becoming a charge on the county, and, further, that he or she, at all times, demean himself or herself in strict conformity with the laws of this State that now or hereafter may be enacted; and for any violation of the laws (however trivial) the whole fine of $1,000 was recoverable. And any person harboring a negro or mulatto or hiring or giving him sustenance, not having such certificate or giving such bond, except he was a resident when the law was passed, was to be fined $500.

Every person bringing a negro in the State for the purpose of freeing him was finable $100. Living in the state of adultery by white with black, and vice versa, punished with $500 fine and with imprisonment in penitentiary for a year, and for each succeeding offense the parties were to be punished doubly and trebly.

That is, the second offense double, the third offense three times, the fourth four times, and so on.

By the new constitution of 1847 only whites were allowed to vote or to serve in the militia. Apportionments for members of the legislature were to be accorded to white population. By article 14 the legislature was required at its first session to pass such laws as would efficiently prevent free persons of color from immigrating and settling in the State, and to prevent effectually the owners of slaves from bringing them into the State for the purpose of setting them free.

By the revised statutes of 1857, page 824, the legislature carried out this provision by the most stringent legislation, and among them was a prohibition against any person bringing into the State any colored person, slave or free, under the penalty of a fine of $500 and imprisonment for one year. And it was also provided that if any negro or mulatto, bond or free, shall come into the State and remain ten days, with the evident intent of residing there, he shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor and fined $50, and he shall be sold to pay fine and costs (if unable to pay them), and his purchaser shall have right to compel him to work, and if, when his term of service under the sale is out, he does not leave the State in ten days he shall be fined $100 and be sold again; and this process of fine, it being increased at every succeeding offense $50, was to go on until the negro or mulatto died or left the State.

In the same book, page 460, persons of color were to have no other interest in the common-school taxes except such amount as they paid themselves. The provision hereinbefore set out against intermarrying between whites and persons of color, against their being witnesses, was continued in the revision of 1858, and was not repealed until 1865. The same provisions also as to adultery between whites and blacks were continued in the revision of 1858, with a special proviso to prevent all misunderstanding, that the law was not to apply where whites alone were the guilty parties.

The constitutional provisions before set out remained unchanged and unaltered until August, 1870.

That was the provision of the laws of Illinois upon the subject running through to the year 1865; but it is said sometimes was under the dictation of Stephen A. Douglas, and these laws did not represent the views and wishes and the sentiments of the people of that great State.

The constitution of Iowa, 1846, article 6, allows only whites in the militia; and by article 2, section 1, only whites were allowed to vote.

Indians, negroes, and mulattoes not allowed to give evidence in a case where whites were interested.

By the new constitution of 1857, idiots, insane persons, and those convicted of infamous crimes, and colored persons—are not allowed to vote. Only whites allowed in the militia.

Note the allocation—

It was just as bad in Iowa, so far as the right of suffrage was concerned, to be a negro or a mulatto as to be an idiot or an insane person or a person convicted of an infamous crime.

Constitution of Michigan, 1835—only whites allowed to vote.

By the constitution of 1850, article 7, whites, unnaturalized foreigners who have declared their intentions to become citizens, and civilized Indians were allowed to vote, but not negroes or mulattoes.

An unnaturalized foreigner was allowed to vote, but no man who had a distinct and visable admixture of African blood in his veins was allowed to vote. By article 17 of that constitution whites only were allowed to serve in the militia.

They were not even as liberal as they were in Massachusetts. Massachusetts would not allow negroes to serve in the ranks, would not allow them to have guns, would not allow them to march and countermarch and be drilled, but allowed them to go to a camp and to wait on the white soldiers. Michigan was not as liberal as that.

Under the constitution of Wisconsin, article 11, these persons only were allowed to vote: First, white citizens of the United States; second, white persons of foreign birth who had merely declared their intention to become citizens; third, Indians who had been declared by act of Congress citizens, and also any civilized person of Indian descent.

Whites only were allowed in the militia, and only whites were allowed to serve on jury.

This is shown by the revised statutes of that State of 1858.

How was it in Minnesota?

The constitution of 1857 made white citizens and white foreigners voters, as in the constitution of Wisconsin; persons of mixed Indian blood—

"Of mixed Indian blood," mark you—who have adopted the customs and the habits of civilization, and also persons of whole Indian blood who adopted the language, habits, and customs of civilization, and after being examined by a court and found competent, were also made voters, but negroes and mulattoes were excluded.

In the revision of 1858—

only whites could be grand jurors, and only whites could serve in the militia.

Now we come to the State of Oregon, and the history of that State is especially interesting to the American people and to the students of the great questions of how, and by what means, and against what convictions the attempt is made to place the foot of the African in Mississippi, Louisiana, and North and South Carolina upon the neck of the Anglo-Saxon.

Constitution of 1857, whites only were voters, and the constitution, while it prohibited slavery, also prohibited free negroes from coming to the State or holding real estate there, or making any contracts within the State, or maintaining any suit in its courts; and the legislature was required to pass laws to carry out this provision. This constitution was unchanged in 1872, and probably it is so at this time.

By the revised statutes of Nebraska of 1866 negroes were not allowed to vote; but naturalized whites, foreigners who had merely declared their intentions to become citizens, were allowed to vote. * * * Marriages were made void when one party is white and the other had one-fourth or more of negro blood.

The statute on common schools declared that for the purpose of affording a free education "to all white youths" a school tax should be levied on whites only.

This provision was not changed till 1869.

The statute on witnesses provided that every human being of sufficient capacity to understand the obligations of an oath is a competent witness * * * except the following—

Now, let us see who are the exceptions:

Every human being of sufficient capacity to understand the obligation of an oath shall be a competent witness * * *

First. Persons of unsound mind, etc.

Second. Indians and negroes who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined or of relating them intelligently or truly.

Only whites were allowed to serve on juries.

The constitution of the State was adopted in 1867. It excluded negroes and mulattoes from voting—but allowed unnaturalized foreigners to vote as soon as they had declared their intention of becoming citizens.

The prohibition of intermarriage between whites and blacks was reenacted in the code of 1873, and also exclusion of negroes from juries.

The constitution of Nevada, framed in 1864, allows whites only to vote, and whites allowed only in the militia.

By the constitution of Kansas, adopted in 1859, negroes were not allowed to vote, but naturalized foreigners were.

They were excluded from the militia.

Only electors, and they were white only, were allowed to sit on juries. Then, as I have said, you find no such restrictions in the constitution and laws of South Carolina, and I have only cited these cases for information and to show that the Northern States have out-Heroded Herod. Then again I invite attention to the constitution of South Carolina and the laws made under that constitution, again asserting that its provisions are more favorable to the negro than many Northern States, a copy of which I hold in my hand for anyone to read for himself.

I speak more particularly of my own State, one of the proudest and grandest in the Union. I am proud of her and her traditions, her past and present history, her brave men and noble women. I love everything that pertains to her history, her hills and her valleys, her mountains and her meadows, her rivulets and her rivers, and all her memories of the past and glories of the present. No truer, braver, or more heroic men, nor fairer, more patriotic, or more virtuous women live upon the earth. During the fateful days from 1861 to 1865 her sons illustrated their heroism upon a hundred bloody fields, standing by the sinking star of a doomed cause, though just, bearing in their manly hearts a more forlorn hope than that which inspired the Six Hundred at Balaklava, and following the Southern Cross with a devotion and courage that would have added new luster to Rome's victorious legions in her palmiest days. But when our flag went down upon the fatal field of Appomattox, when Robert E. Lee said we would fight no more, South Carolina accepted in good faith, with all the South, the result, and if anything more is needed to test her loyalty I refer you to the Spanish war again, which will have its weight with all fair-minded men.

Some of the richest blood of the South has been poured out in that war upon the decks of our battle ships and upon bloody fields, and to-day wherever our armies are found the South and the North stand together in deeds of patriotic duty. But in addition to all other responsibilities and duties the people of the South have a race problem to solve—the most difficult that ever confronted a proud-spirited people. Yet we feel that we can solve it and will solve it if only let alone; and I want to say right here we feel that we must solve it without any help from the North. It is a question that we alone can settle, best guided by the wisest statesmanship and forbearance toward the negro. Then let us settle it ourselves in our own way.

There are some things in which we are left alone, and one of them was the Charleston Exposition. The Fifty-sixth Congress saw fit at its last session to appropriate $500,000 for Buffalo, N. Y., and $5,000,000 more for the St. Louis Exposition has been granted, and an appropriation of $250,000 was refused to South Carolina for the Charleston and West India Exposition. In advocating that measure I made the following short appeal in a speech upon the floor of the House while the question was pending, but in vain:

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, let us look at this matter dispassionately and without excitement. Let us look at it as a business proposition, for it is one of plain business. This Government is asked to spend $250,000 in order to place its own exhibits where they can be seen at the Charleston and West Indian Exposition by visitors from every section of the country. Charleston has raised $250,000 and the State legislature has given $50,000. Now, will the Government do it? This money is not a gift from the Government, but only spending its own money to place upon exhibit its own resources. The gentleman from Minnesota says the St. Louis exposition will be an international one. I say Charleston's will be a national one and will be equally as important as the other. Let us ask if South Carolina's history does not entitle her to consideration along this line, as well as the State of New York, Tennessee, Louisiana, or any of them.

Yes, sir, the record of South Carolina in our struggle for independence can very safely challenge a comparison with any other of her sister colonies. In the patriotism of her women, none excel her, and she can recall with pride the devotion of Mrs. Motte, whose palatial residence being occupied by the British, furnished the patriots with the means of destruction of her own beautiful home. She can point with pride to the perilous trip of Emily Geiger on horseback from old Cambridge to Charleston, carrying the message to General Greene that foiled the brutal Tarleton in his murderous designs. Many other names might be mentioned, but time forbids, and then I am only speaking from memory on the spur of the moment about some of the noble women and men of my native State.

I know her statesmen were potential and prominent in the organization and establishment of our magnificent system of government. She gave to the struggling patriots the "Swamp Fox" in the person of Marion, who was never caught; the gamecock Sumter, who was never defeated, and the gallant Moultrie, who never gave up the fort; and when the chivalric Frenchman, the gallant soldier, the sincere lover of liberty, and Washington's friend and associate, Lafayette, was imprisoned in the Fortress Olmutz it was one of South Carolina's most distinguished soldiers and patriots, Colonel Laurens, who, without regard to the dangers involved in such an enterprise, at his own expense went to France and undertook to effect the release and escape of his illustrious companion in arms.

When future generations shall read the history of our Continental war, there is nothing in prose, poetry, or song, in fiction or reality, more captivating and instructive than South Carolina's part in accomplishing the independence of America. There stands to-day at the head of Broad street, in the city of Charleston, that grand old city by the sea, the very building, then used as a prison, in which patriots were confined by the Tories, and visitors may now see the very spot, with the very iron staples, in which the patriot Hayne was confined, and from which he was taken to cruel and bloody execution, and many other places may be seen there which makes Charleston one of the most historic cities in the United States.

Whatever may have been the history of South Carolina in later years I will not now speak, except to say that her sons have nothing to apoligize for or to be ashamed of. I can simply refer now to her earlier actions and repeat with pride Mr. Webster's reference to Massachusetts in his famous debate with Senator Hayne, "There stands Massachusetts with her Boston Commons, her Faneuil Hall, and her Bunker Hill, and there she will stand forever." The same grand and eloquent tribute will equally apply to South Carolina, where she will stand upon her record forever. Now, Mr. Speaker, South Carolina invites her sister States to come and erect buildings there and place their products on exhibition. She asks the General Government to do so.

We invite the people from the North, South, East, and West to come to South Carolina to see our people and become better acquainted with them. Let us have this small appropriation, and come down into the country whose patriot soldiers with their life's blood have moistened the soil of this nation, as I have already said, upon every battlefield from Bunker Hill and Lexington to Yorktown for American liberty. Come down amongst us and see our marvelous advancement in agriculture, manufacturing, mining, and all the other industries. Come down amongst and help us to prove to the world that we do not punish the most humble citizen, red, white, black, or blue, without a just cause, and help us to give the lie to the slanderous statements recently published in the North American, published in Philadelphia. [Applause.]

This appropriation was snowed under by a large vote. It may have been in part because it was for South Carolina; but this denial did not stop the enterprise, for the grand old city by the sea then went to work with renewed vigor and energy, and to-day the world has never witnessed a more beautiful exposition.

Although unaided by any appropriation from without, the people at the head of this undertaking met and overcame every obstacle. They would not think of defeat, their determination becoming stronger when assistance was refused. They determined to prove to the world that the blood that had for two centuries stirred the hearts of their forefathers to deeds of heroism and valor that will always live in history still flowed in their veins and was as pure as when it inspired the men under Rhett, beating off the minions of Spain and conquering the pirates, or, commanded by Moultrie, scattering and running off the fleet of Parker from the fort of palmetto logs, or those who slept in the woods with the turf as a pillow and the sky as a covering, under Marion, Morgan, Sumter, and Pickens, keeping the torch of victory ablaze, and in 1812 when they went forth against Great Britain, and in the Mexican war planted the palmetto flag first on the walls of Chapultepec. Thus undaunted and undismayed have the sons of these sires gone about the task of making a success of the Charleston Exposition.

Then I warn you that you might as well let us alone in the solution of this race problem, for we intend to solve it and solve it right. Let us alone and we will work out our salvation and destiny profitably and honorably to the white people, satisfactorily and justly to the negro, and to the credit, honor, and upbuilding of our common interest everywhere in this broad land.

That we intend to continue in our constitutions all the regulations and restrictions upon the right of suffrage as a protection against ignorance, vulgarity, and vice you need not doubt for a moment. You may rest assured that we intend to forever preserve white supremacy; nor do we ever again intend to be governed by an ignorant and brutal race. We are the friends of the colored man, and no one recognizes this better than he does himself. He is satisfied with his condition if let alone, and will be happy and contented and prosperous. You may succeed, but I do not believe it, in voting some of these measures through the House, and perchance enact some of them into law; but let me tell you, you can never succeed in altering the laws of nature. They are like the laws of the Medes and Persians. God made this a white man's country and a white man's Government, and, by the eternal, white men intend to rule it or die—South, North, East, or West—and that man who is not a white man in principle ought to cast his lot where he thinks he belongs and live with those he seems to love so well. God made all things, amongst them the birds and fishes, each governed by a natural law, the bird to live in the air and the fish in the water, and so must it be. The bird will die under the water and the fish can not live on the land, and God Almighty never intended Himself that the black bird or the crow should ever get up to the top of the mountain aerie where alone the white eagle lives and raises her brood.

Let me say again, in conclusion, that it may be that you may possibly pass some measure of unwarranted interference with the domestic affairs of the Southern people; but I warn you, yes, I notify you, that you can not stifle the voice, stay the strong arm, subdue the spirit, or destroy the might influence of the Anglo-Saxon. Wherever you find him—whether on the banks of the Hudson or the Potomac, whether in the North or in the South, in the East or in the West—you can not wipe out the fact that he is a white man, before whose tread the wild Indian, the cunning Asiatic, and the ferocious African alike recede. [Applause.]

Again I abjure you, on the other side of the House, to withdraw the apple of discord. Let us alone and let us help you to build up our common interests in the future as we have done in the past. Let prejudices, animosities, and estrangements be buried forever, and then with hands and hearts united, with one purpose—a purpose as high as humanity and justice—inviting the benediction of heaven upon our patriotic efforts, let us go forward in the advancement of this magnificent country of ours, stretching from ocean to ocean, until it has been made to reach upward to the highest and happiest civilization that ever adorned or blessed a people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, if there is no one else who desires to speak, I ask the Clerk to proceed with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

CAPITOL POLICE.

For captain, $1,600, and 3 lieutenants, at $1,200 each, hereafter to be selected jointly by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives; 30 privates, at $1,100 each; 30 privates, at $960 each; and 8 watchmen, at $900 each, one-half of said privates and watchmen to be selected by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and one-half by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives; in all, $74,200, one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MADDOX. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana why the bill makes a distinction in reference to these privates on the Capitol police force. You pay some of them $1,100 each, and some of them $950 each.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That distinction has been made for some time.

Mr. MADDOX. Why is it so?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It has been made for many years. I will state to the gentleman that that is one of the questions that the committee, upon which he and I both have the honor to be members, will take up some time during this session of Congress and try to recast all of these salaries; but in this bill we make no changes whatever in the salaries of the employees of the House or Senate.

Mr. MADDOX. This is what they have been paid heretofore?

Mr. HEMENWAY. These are the salaries they have been paid heretofore.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds: For chief engineer, $1,700; 3 assistant engineers, at $1,200 each; 6 conductors of elevators, at $1,100 each, who shall be under the supervision and direction of the Architect of the Capitol; laborer, $820; 6 firemen, at $900 each; electrician, $1,200; laborer, $1,000; 2 laborers, at $720 each; laborer to clean Statuary Hall and watch statuary therein, $660; laborer in toilet room, $720; 3 cabinet-makers, who shall be skilled in their trade, 1 at $1,200 and 2 at $900 each; in all, $22,600.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 13, in line 13, strike out "Architect of the Capitol" and insert in lieu thereof "Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds;" and in line 22 strike out "twenty-two thousand six hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-six thousand one hundred and forty."

Mr. HEMENWAY. That simply changes the total to conform to the items, and changes the title of this office from Architect of the Capitol to Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds shall supervise and direct the care and repair of all furniture in the Hall, cloak-rooms, lobby, committee rooms, and offices of the House, and all furniture hereafter required for the House of Representatives or for any of its committee rooms or offices shall be procured on designs and specifications made or approved by him.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against that paragraph that it is new legislation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I desire to be heard when the gentleman has completed his statement, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ADAMS. That changes existing law and therefore comes under the rule of the House—that it is new legislation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I desire to call the attention of the Chairman to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 19, 1901, page 411. I call the Chairman's attention to this resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the report of the commission to direct and supervise the refurnishing of the House as relates to the rules of the House be referred to the Committee on Rules, and so much of the said report as relates to the care, repair, and purchase of furniture be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with authority to report the same in one of the general appropriation bills.

Now, under that resolutian we deal with this question, and I insist that it is properly before the committee.

Mr. ADAMS. Was that made in this Congress?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Made December 19, 1901; it was made to this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if there is any such office under existing law as superintendent of the Capitol building?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The urgent deficiency bill, which has passed the House, changes the title of the Architect of the Capitol to Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. That bill has not become a law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No.

Mr. ADAMS. I would submit, in spite of the report which the gentleman has called to the attention of the Chair, that that does not change the rule of the House, that this is new legislation and out of order because it changes existing law. The fact that a committee have made a suggestion does not abrogate the standing rule of this House, that new legislation is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Chair is in doubt, I want to be heard further; but I do not desire to take up the time of the committee if the Chair is not in doubt after reading that resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if the House has adopted any resolution covering this subject?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It adopted that resolution which I have read. That action was taken December 19, during this session of Congress, authorizing the Committee on Appropriations to deal with this question on any general appropriation bill and report to the House on this very question, referring the care of furniture, etc., to such person as the Committee on Appropriations desired to refer it to. Now, under that resolution we give to the Superintendent or Architect of the Capitol the care and custody of this furniture and transfer the force charged with its care to his room.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman that portion of the resolution referring it to the committee?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That was verbatim the language of their recommendation. We can have it, if the Chair desires it.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit to the Chair a little further information, that on this identical subject along in the last Congress a committee was appointed in this House to look after refurnishing the House, and it made a report, and its recommendations were adopted.

Now, this is a change of the law in that respect after the House had considered the matter fully, after it had been investigated by this committee authorized by the House, and now it is a direct change of law as adopted by the House at the last Congress; that is clearly new legislation, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if this amendment is not in the very words of the provision that was passed in the urgent deficiency bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is in the same language. I believe the gentleman from Tennessee was on the commission. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the recommendation of the commission if the Chair is in doubt. I have the report of the commission here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be pleased to hear so much of it as relates to this subject.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The commission also recommend the adoption of the following:

Hereafter the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds shall supervise and direct the care and repair of all furniture in the Hall, cloakrooms, lobby, committee rooms, and offices of the House; and all furniture hereafter required for the House of Representatives or for any of its committee rooms or offices shall be procured on designs and specifications made or approved by him.

Now, then, following that, upon the report of this commission, the House authorized the Committee on Appropriations to carry out this recommendation on any general appropriation bill. That was given by the resolution the Chair has. Following that authority, we copy into our bill the exact recommendation of this commission, which I think is composed of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. STEELE. I would like to know if this increases the number of employees or decreases the expense?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, it will certainly tend to increase the efficiency of those that are employed in this matter.

Mr. STEELE. Who is the man now employed to do this job? There seems to have been some death.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, I have the name of the man, and I know there has been trouble.

Mr. STEELE. Is he from Indiana or Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, he is not from Indiana.

Mr. STEELE. Then he must be from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that he is not from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEELE. Is he recommended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania? It does not make any difference, if he is a good man.

Mr. ADAMS. That has nothing to do with the matter before the House. I do not see why the gentleman should break in in that vein in regard to the point of order. When the gentleman from Indiana says this is the exact language that was recommended by the commission it can not be so, because they recommended that this should be under the Architect of the Capitol; but he says that office has been done away with, and that we now have the Superintendent of the Capitol. It may have been that the commission would not have recommended this if they had known that change was to be made.

This House is flooded by architects all over the country with protests against that change, and it may have been that this commission would not have made that recommendation, and this House would not have passed that resolution giving to the Committee on Appropriations the authority they have, if they had known that change would have been made. When it authorized the Committee on Appropriations to do certain things, it did not authorize them to make legislation on appropriation bills against the rules of the House.

Now, if they wish to make changes, there is a proper way to legislate in conformity with the rules of the House. The rules say that no legislation shall be passed on an appropriation bill. They do not bring in a bill in accordance with the rules of the House. They make it against the rules of the House.

I have never yet seen the Chair hold that any legislation on an appropriation bill under the rules of the House is not subject to a point of order. If that commission or any outside body has recommended this to the Committee on Appropriations in order to carry out the recommendation of the commission, they should bring it into the House in the form of a bill or resolution in conformity with the rules of the House. I respectfully submit to the Chair that this point is well taken, in my judgment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. By the rules of the House the Committee on Appropriations has been authorized to deal with this question on a general appropriation bill, which gives us the jurisdiction; and, following that jurisdiction, we take up the exact language of their recommendation and put it in this bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the gentleman hold that that authorizes the committee to break the rules of procedure of the House?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman does not seem to understand——

Mr. ADAMS. No; I do not.

Mr. HEMENWAY (continuing). That by the resolution of the House, passed December 19, the Committee on Appropriations was authorized to take jurisdiction and to deal with this matter on any general appropriation bill.

Mr. ADAMS. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then this provision is in order.

Mr. ADAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but it is not in order, for the reason that it authorized the committee to report legislation; but it meant that it should be reported in accordance with the rules of the House. It authorized the committee to report a bill making the change as new legislation, but it is not authorized to bring in this legislation on an appropriation bill against the rules of the procedure of the House. Things must be done in an orderly way, and to authorize the committee to consider this question is not authorizing them to consider it on an appropriation bill, and thereby violate the rules of the House. That is so patent that it hardly needs argument.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have just come into the House, but my recollection is that the committee is acting under a resolution of the House giving it authority to report this amendment, as I think I can show the Chair if I can find the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois or the gentleman from Indiana if the office of "Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds" now exists?

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Chair is in doubt on that point, I will offer an amendment changing this to the "Architect of the Capitol."

The CHAIRMAN. There is one other question which the Chair desires to ask the gentleman, and that is whether, if this point of order be overruled, you would create by implication the office of "Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds?" The Chair desires to ask if that is the intention of the committee; that if this is passed in its present shape, it will create the office of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That office was created on the urgent deficiency bill which has passed the House.

The CHAIRMAN. But that has not yet become a law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If there is any doubt in the mind of the Chair we will change it to Architect of the Capitol. There is no desire to create a new office at all, and no intention to create one.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that if this clause is passed with the word "Superintendent" in it and the urgent deficiency bill does not become a law this clause is inoperative, so that no harm will be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wanted to get at the idea of the committee as to whether the office would be created if this passed in its present shape.

Mr. CANNON. I think this would not create the office.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest that it may be made to read either the "Architect of the Capitol" or the "Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that would relieve the Chair of this question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Suppose we change it to Architect of the Capitol and the urgent deficiency bill becomes a law, then would not this clause be inoperative?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; it would not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his point of order, in view of the proposed amendment?

Mr. ADAMS. I do not, Mr. Chairman, for that does not enter into my point at all. My point is that this is new legislation, by taking it away from the Clerk of the House, who now controls the matter, and putting it into the hands of the Architect or Superintendent of the Capitol, or whatever designation you may give him.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. ADAMS. My point of order is that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it new legislation in that it takes it away from the Clerk?

Mr. ADAMS. My point of order is that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should point out in what respect it is new legislation.

Mr. ADAMS. I have already pointed out that under the resolution of the House which the gentleman from Indiana refers to, he is named in that resolution as the "Architect of the Capitol." Therefore they are not acting under those instructions, even from their own standpoint, because they now bring in a provision that it shall be transferred to the "Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds." It is new legislation in every phase of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would not hesitate to rule that the point of order was not well taken if the gentleman's point refers to the question of taking it away from the Clerk, because that power is vested by this resolution in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ADAMS. I make the point of order that it is new legislation, covering every phase of the amendment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. To my mind, Mr. Chairman, the provision is not subject to a point of order. If the urgent deficiency bill does not pass and become a law, then this provision would be inoperative. There would be no new position created. We are clearly within the authority given us by that resolution passed by the House. Of course if the Chair sustains the point of order, I will avoid the technicality by offering another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order, inasmuch as the amendment proposes to create a new office, which is not within the authority conferred by the resolution.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the Architect of the Capitol shall supervise and direct the care and repair of all furniture in the hall, cloakrooms, lobby, committee rooms, and offices of the House; and all furniture hereafter required for the House of Representatives or for any of its committee rooms or offices shall be procured on designs and specifications made and approved by the Architect.

Mr. ADAMS. I raise the point of order that this amendment also is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment comes within the power vested in the committee by the resolution already referred to. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Doorkeeper: For Doorkeeper, $3,500; hire of horses, feed, repair of wagon and harness, $800, or so much thereof as may be necessary; assistant doorkeeper, and Department messenger, at $2,000 each; 1 special employee (John T. Chancey), $1,500; 1 special employee, $1,500; clerk to Doorkeeper, and janitor, at $1,200 each; 13 messengers, including the messenger to the reporters' gallery, at $1,200 each; 13 messengers, at $1,000 each; messenger to the Speaker's table, $1,000; 14 messengers on the soldiers' roll, at $1,200 each; 12 laborers, at $720 each; 2 laborers in the water-closet, at $720 each; 1 laborer, $600; 8 laborers, known as cloakroom men, at $50 per month each; 10 laborers, during the session, at $60 per month each, $2,400; female attendant in ladies' retiring room, $720; superintendent of folding room, $2,000; 4 clerks in folding room, 1 at $1,800, and 3 at $1,200 each; foreman, $1,500; messenger, $1,200; page, $500; laborer, $720; 9 folders, at $900 each; 5 folders, at $840 each; 18 folders, at $720 each; night watchman, $900; driver, $600; 2 chief pages, at $900 each; 33 pages, during the session, including 2 riding pages and two telephone pages, at $2.50 per day each, $9,982.50; 10 pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, during the session, at $2.50 per day each, $3,025; horse and buggy for Department messenger, $250; superintendent of document room, $2,000; assistant superintendent of document room, $1,800; 6 assistants in document room, 1 at $1,600, 2 at $1,400 each, 1 at $1,200, and 2 at $1,000 each; in all, $143,037.50.

Mr. BURKETT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 15, page 16, strike out "13" and insert "15;" also, at the end of the line, insert the words "including two telephone messengers;" and amend line 12, page 17, by striking out the words "and two telephone pages."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order in the first place that we have passed the item to which the amendment applies, and that therefore it comes too late, and in the next place that the amendment proposes to change existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk had just completed the reading of this paragraph, which is quite lengthy.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then I make the point of order that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, under the law at present these messengers are carried on the roll; they are messengers now. I understand this bill changes existing law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no. This is in the exact language of the previous bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana hold that we have no right on a bill of this kind to increase the number of employees of the House?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not if it changes existing law. But this is not an effort to increase the number of employees; it is an effort to increase salaries already fixed by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask whether this amendment proposes to increase the statutory salary?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no statutory salary, but this is an increase of the salary fixed by the last appropriation act, and that is the existing law. It has always been held that an amendment seeking to increase a salary fixed by a previous appropriation act is a change of existing law and subject to a point of order.

Mr. BURKETT. About 400 of the employees or officers named in this bill would be in a bad fix if the gentleman from Indiana is correct.

Mr. HEMENWAY. But let us take the other side of the question. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] can not show any law authorizing an increase of these salaries which he proposes to increase. If there is no such law the amendment is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any law that fixes either the salaries or the number of these employees except appropriation bills?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no statute; they are fixed by the last appropriation act; and an effort to increase a salary fixed by the last appropriation act is a change of existing law. That is the only law there is on the question. And I say take the other side of it. Can the gentleman point out any law authorizing his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The question might arise, then, whether his amendment was not as much in order as your proposition itself. If so, of course it must be held to be in order. If the proposition itself is in order, then the amendment must be in order, unless it is against the statutory law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, if the Chair please, the only law fixing the salaries of these House employees or of the numerous employees of the different departments of the Government is the last appropriation bill. If this amendment is not subject to a point of order, then any member may rise here and propose to increase the salary of any employee of the Government whose salary is not fixed by statute, and it would be in order.

It would be a complete reversal of the rulings of the Chair, at least since I have been a member of this House. There is no law authorizing the increase of these salaries. The gentleman can not point to any provision of law authorizing their increase. So then it is not an appropriation following the current law. It is not an appropriation authorized by law. For that reason it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit this to the Chair, that any salary fixed by an appropriation bill is for a given time. It is for twelve months. I think during that twelve months, if that salary should be attempted to be changed, it would be subject to a point of order, and to that extent my colleague is right; but there is no salary for a given clerk, either in this House or in any of the departments, fixed by an appropriation act, which extends beyond a given time, namely, the 1st of July next.

Now suppose, as my colleague says, that that can not be changed—that is, that it is a fixed salary—and suppose that place is not provided for in this appropriation bill at all. Does the gentleman undertake to say that that salary would go on in 1903? Not at all. The salary is fixed from June 30 to June 30 next following, and that is all there is in it, and when that time expires and this bill which we are now considering goes into effect, then the salary of any clerk or employee may be raised or lowered on the appropriation bill. That is my position.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that unless there is some statutory provision fixing the salaries of these several employees, and their number, that a proposition of this kind would not be out of order. The Chair approaches this question with great liberalty, because it is a question affecting the House, and therefore the House itself ought to put the most liberal construction upon it; and unless the gentleman from Indiana can cite some statutory provision limiting the salary or limiting the number, the Chair would be constrained——

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Chair please, there is no statutory provision fixing the salaries of all the employees of all of these departments of this Government, except here and there, and there is no statutory provision fixing the salaries of the employees of this House; but the last appropriation act in this case does fix these salaries, and that is the law. And any effort to change that law by a proposition to increase a salary is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BURKETT. But the present appropriation ends June 30, 1903.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman will find, if he examines the law for the several departments, that there was a statutory provision adopted many years ago fixing the salaries of certain classes of employees.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Fixing the salaries that certain clerks might receive, and Congress was empowered to provide additional numbers within those classes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. But, Mr. Chairman, after you get away from the clerks of classes 1, 2, 3, and 4 and certain heads of departments whose salaries are fixed by statute, every other salary appropriated for in the different departments, the clerks of $1,000, the clerks at $900, the clerks at $720, the chiefs of divisions, every one of those salaries could be increased by an amendment offered on the floor if this amendment is not subject to a point of order. I think it has been the universal ruling that the appropriation bill fixing a salary was the law until changed. But if the Chair rules that this point of order is not well taken, I say it opens up the gates to an increase of salary of all these clerks who are not classified in the different departments of the Government.

I have always understood that the appropriation act fixing the salary was the law, and that any effort to change that law was subject to the point of order. Here is an employee provided for on an appropriation bill, provided for at a fixed salary, which has been carried from year to year. Here is an effort now to raise that salary and change the existing law, the law which at present regulates that salary. Items are not in order upon an appropriation bill unless authorized by law.

What law, may I ask, Mr. Chairman, authorizes the increase of this salary? There is no law on our statute books or upon an appropriation bill which authorizes the increase of this salary; consequently, not being authorized by law, it is not in order upon a general appropriation bill.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts if he desires to be heard.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I was just going to say, Mr. Chairman, a word or two upon this point of order. If I remember correctly, it has been repeatedly ruled by Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole, in accordance with the contention of the gentleman from Indiana, that the last appropriation bill became the existing law in respect to the salary there fixed; and therefore it becomes a very important practical question for the Chair to consider whether he will follow these rulings or depart from them.

In all candor I am bound to say to the Chair that as an original question it would seem to me to be difficult to escape the logic of the gentleman from Georgia, that the appropriation bill fixes the salary only for the term covered by that bill; and if I were called upon to rule upon it as an original proposition of law, it would cause me to sustain the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia. I only impress it upon the Chair as res adjudicata, the result of many decisions by Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole. Of course the Chair may think a bad precedent is better overruled than followed. These are all the remarks I desire to submit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would very much like to rule against this point of order, but would like some law upon the subject. It is a very difficult question. The Chair admits that.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I did not understand the suggestion of the Chair. The only ground upon which I place it to sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana is, that these points of order have been sustained for the reasons just given the Chair. If it should have to stand the test of pure logic, that is another matter. I do not know of any decision which has overruled the decisions to which I have referred.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then I wish to call the attention of the Chair, further, to this: I do not know that I quote the provision of the rule like it is, but I think it is that nothing that is not authorized by current law is in order upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; you have got that wrong.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Nothing that is not authorized by law. Now, where is the law which authorizes this change in salary?

The CHAIRMAN. This is the law which governs the employees of the House the Chair has here, stipulating the number; and comparing that with your bill, the Chair would like to ask the gentleman whether this bill complies with the statutory number.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will state to the Chair that it does not. That was repealed in 1874.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest, in addition to what I said a moment ago, that since my connection with this committee the invariable rule has been that where we have wanted a provision to continue after a year we have uniformly used the word "thereafter." I will give you an instance of it. In a clause on an appropriation bill we took out of all the Executive Departments in Washington these time clocks.

That was done in an appropriation bill; but we took care to put right after that, and "shall be in force hereafter." Now, I admit you can fix the amount of the salary by the appropriation bill, perhaps, by using that kind of language, and in carrying it from year to year. No doubt about that.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Would you claim that the same rule applied to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, that the salaries are fixed each year?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes; they are fixed in the appropriation bill. You can change them every year.

Mr. HILL. I am very glad to get that information, because I have been ruled out twice on that ground.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In the diplomatic bill they are doing that every year. Salaries are lowered or raised or changed in the appropriation bill that comes before this House. It changes the salaries for this year where they are not fixed by statutes——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON (continuing). And it is the only law on this question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman if this case itself is not a complete test of this question? Suppose that there was no provision in this bill for the payment of this particular salary of this person, would he have any claim against the Government that he could assert for his salary based upon the price he had been paid under a general appropriation bill?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Not at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then is not that conclusive that it is not a change of an existing statute?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes. The only law in the premises here is the appropriation bill, which is an appropriation ending June 30, 1903. Then it will die, and die by limitation, and every salary in it not carried by statute will die with it; and this House has the right every twelve months to fix it in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair ask the gentleman this question: The gentleman from Indiana says that the appropriation bill clearly violates the law of 1874.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That has been repealed. The law that you are reading from now has been repealed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Chair misunderstood me. The appropriation bill, in the number of employees, does not follow that law. That law, as I understand, has been repealed, and the number of employees in the House has from time to time been changed on appropriation bills. This amendment does not further increase the number, but it increases the salary of those already provided for. It is not an effort to increase the number of employees, but an effort to increase the salary of those on the pay roll; and I insist, Mr. Chairman, that this appropriation bill fixes the salary of those now upon the list, and is the law, and that any effort to increase their salaries is subject to a point of order; that it is not authorized by law, and for that reason is subject to the point of order.

Mr. BARNEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. BARNEY. Are there not several instances on appropriation bills where the salary of Government employees has been increased?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think that is true, but I think every increase was subject to a point of order. Why, on the Agricultural bill every increase of salary at the last session went off on a point of order, when the point of order was made. On the consular and diplomatic bill two amendments seeking to increase salaries, offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], went off on a point of order. It has been the universal custom in this House to hold that any effort to increase the salary already provided for on an appropriation bill is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman contend that an appropriation bill fixes the salary for all time to come?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not contend that, but I contend the salary is fixed until it is changed, and it can not be changed on an appropriation bill, if the point of order is made.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee and the Chair to an express decision on the point on page 322 of Mr. Hinds's Parliamentary Precedents. It is a recent decision, made March 30, 1898. The House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the naval appropriation bill. An amendment was proposed by Mr. NORTON of Ohio fixing the compensation of the Assistant Librarian at $1,800 instead of $1,400, as provided by the paragraph as read. Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON of Illinois made a point of order against the amendment on the ground that there was no statute providing for the salary of this officer; that the salary appropriated for from year to year in the appropriation bill was regarded as a legal salary. The Chairman, Mr. SHERMAN of New York, sustained the point of order.

Now, that is a decision exactly in point, and it is but one of a series of decisions that, according to my own memory, has been made. I desire to guard carefully my position, and to repeat what I said to the Chair before, that if the question were an original one it seems to me the point of order would not be well taken, and that the position of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] would be the right position. But it is a question of standing by the decisions of the House or overruling them, and that question I am entirely content to submit to the present occupant of the chair, it being understood that precedents are in favor of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can say anything to aid the Chair, if the Chair is in doubt. But it occurs to me that in the decision the gentleman from Massachusetts has just quoted from, we are not informed how that office is created for which the salary was intended to be increased. I do not have before me the various decisions, but, in my mind, Mr. Chairman, there is no question about the right to raise a salary in this bill. Under the law this House has a right to name its employees and to pay them. There can be no question about that. The bill that we are now considering is a law for the next fiscal year. The law that they ask us to follow is a law that started out in these words: "Ending June 30, 1902." There is no question in my mind but that law that ended or is to end in 1902 can not be called in to control our right in fixing salaries for 1903.

These decisions that are read do not convince me, and would not convince unless I knew that the offices referred to were not created under any other law than the act itself. For example, the office of messenger or telephone boy is not created by any general law of the United States. We legislate for them and appropriate for them as one of the necessary parts of this House. Now, our telephone service might be so poor that we did not want to continue it. Suppose the telephones were taken out, and we had no use for the services of the boys?

Now, it seems to me, no one will contend that the Doorkeeper would have the right to appoint those two telephone messengers and that somebody could draw salaries as such simply because a provision for those two messengers has been in some other appropriation act. If we have the right to do away with this telephone messenger, or do away with five pages, or do away with the messengers at some one of these doors, we have the right to raise the salary of these pages, we have the right to put on another page or raise the salary of a messenger or raise the salary of these telephone messengers.

That is simply what the amendment proposes to do—simply to place the salaries of these telephone men up to within $200 of what the telegraph messengers receive. The amendment does not create any new office; it simply fixes the compensation of offices that we have for the next year—offices already created under the terms of the law which expires June 30, 1902.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have just sent to the desk for the amendment. I observe that it proposes to provide for "two telephone pages." This is clearly an effort to create new offices. There is no law authorizing such an office; to adopt this amendment would create an absolutely new office, to be known as "telephone messenger," and would fix the pay at $1,200 a year.

Mr. BURKETT. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether there is any law outside of the last appropriation act creating the offices of telephone pages.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is not, so far as I know.

Mr. BURKETT. The last appropriation act expires June 30, 1902.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman may make a point of order against the whole bill if he desires to do so; but I insist that this is an effort to create two new offices not known now to the law, not now provided for by any statute. If there is any provision which could possibly be offered to an appropriation bill which would be subject to a point of order, the present effort by new legislation to create new offices with new names is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not refrain from saying that if this question were presented for the first time he would have no hesitation in ruling the amendment to be in order; but to carry out in that way the conviction of the Chair might overturn the whole appropriation bill, or so large a portion of it as to render it inoperative. The Chair therefore takes the opportunity to shield himself behind the decisions which have been heretofore made, and sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The following paragraph was read:

Order (purchasing): For chief of division, $2,250; 1 assistant, $1,500; 1 assistant, $1,200; 3 assistants, at $900 each; 2 assistants, at $720 each; 2 assistants at $660 each; 1 assistant, $520; and 2 messenger boys, at $360 each; in all, $11,530.

Mr. MANN. I desire to reserve a point of order on this paragraph until I have asked a question of the gentleman in charge of the bill. I notice that in this portion of the bill there are several increases of salary; for instance the salary of the chief of division of order (purchasing) is increased from $2,000 to $2,500; the salary of the chief of the division of bibliography is increased from $2,000 to $2,500; the salary of the chief of the division of manuscript is increased from $1,500 to $3,000; and the salary of the chief of the division of maps and charts from $2,000 to $2,500. Reserving a point of order, I simply want to ask the reason for these increases.

Mr. HEMENWAY. They are the result of the hearings had by the committee. I think that as to this particular branch of the Government—the Library of Congress—the pressure for increase of salaries came mostly from members of Congress. These propositions are probably subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I suppose there is no question about that.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman from Illinois or anyone else desires to make the point of order——

Mr. MANN. I was not intending to make any point of order, but I wished to know the reason for these increases before the provisions were passed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The increases have been made in consequence of the facts appearing in the hearing and upon requests of members of Congress. For instance, as to Mr. Griffin, I think several members of the House came and insisted that he was an expert, perhaps the greatest in his line in the United States.

Mr. MANN. May I ask whether members of the House are competent to pass upon the expertness of an officer of the Library?

Mr. HEMENWAY. As to this particular officer, gentlemen say that when you want information upon some particular question and you have not time to look it up, you can go to this gentleman and at once obtain the information you want; that he has wonderful ability in selecting and furnishing books along any particular line which may be desired; that, for instance, if a member wants books bearing on the revenue, or on trusts, or on any other question, this gentleman at the Library is able to furnish a line of books upon any desired subject.

Mr. McCALL. Allow me to ask the gentleman whether this particular increase has not been strongly recommended by the librarian, Mr. Putnam.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCALL. And he recognizes that this is a highly responsible position and requires that its incumbent should be a scholar and an expert?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In fact, I will say that as to everyone of these increases.

Mr. McCALL. And I will ask the gentleman if Mr. Putnam did not recommend that Mr. Griffin be given $3,000 a year?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That was his recommendation—$3,000 a year.

Mr. McCALL. And then in regard to the position of superintendent of maps; I understand that there is the greatest collection of maps there in the world, and in order to keep that collection up where it now is, relatively to the other great libraries, it is necessary to have a really accomplished man in that position.

Mr. OLMSTED. I should like to add, if you will permit me, that within the knowledge of a great many members of the House, the present chief of that division, Mr. Phillips, is a most accomplished man, most courteous and prompt, most efficient, and of great service to members of this House who desire information in his very important division. I hope that the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. McCALL. I trust the gentleman will not make the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. These recommendations have been made heretofore. They were made a year ago. The Librarian has been very insistent upon increasing these salaries; not to the amounts that we have here given, but to larger amounts. The Committee on Appropriations declined to do this a year ago, and the year before they declined to do it, but this time, upon the urgent recommendation of the Librarian himself, enforced by many members of Congress who have to deal with these gentlemen over there, they have given the increase which appears in the bill.

I regret to say that my time is so taken up that I have never had the pleasure of meeting them. I do not know either of them, but many members of Congress have come and insisted that these gentlemen were of such great value to them that they thought the recommendation of the Librarian ought to be carried out. Yet we refused to carry it out in full, but did give them a limited increase of salary.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman suppose that the members of Congress have taken an active interest in this without any suggestion on the part of the gentlemen who are to be the beneficiaries of the increase?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, as a general proposition, I would say that the gentlemen who are to receive the increase are usually very active; but, so far as I know, in these particular cases no requests have come from the gentlemen who are to receive the increased salaries, and I understand that the gentleman occupying the position of chief of the division of bibliography in the Boston Library receives $3,500 a year.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Thirty-three hundred dollars a year.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Thirty-three hundred dollars a year.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. And this same man received that salary when he was there?

Mr. HEMENWAY. This same man received $3,300 a year while employed in the Boston library. Down here he only receives $2,000 a year, and the Librarian urgently recommended that his salary be increased to $3,000.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman how these people get their appointments in the Congressional Library?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. By competitive examination?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No.

Mr. MANN. Are there any competitive or civil-service examinations for appointments in the Library?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no information as to the means of securing appointments in the Library. I do not know whether they have to pass any examination or not.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman himself has no employees in the Library?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I believe the great State of Indiana has three appointments in that whole Library, a very much less number than the other States.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will excuse me, I should like to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The gentleman referred to did not receive his appointment through any political influence at all. The appointment came through the knowledge of Mr. Young, who was then Librarian, that an exceptionally skillful man in that kind of work was available in the market, and he secured his services.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest, in addition to what my colleague in charge of the bill has said——

Mr. MANN. This is on a reservation of a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] have sufficient time to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes additional.

Mr. MANN. That is long enough.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say, in addition to what has been said already——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what has already been said, the Committee on Appropriations have not raised these salaries, so far as I know, at the request of any particular party interested. I just want to say that all along the line.

I know the subcommittee that presents this bill and the whole committee turned down a great many increases that were recommended by the several departments and made increases on merit and necessity. They both exist in this case. These men are good men. We can not hold them by the salaries they are now drawing.

Other libraries are demanding their services, and if we intend to have competent men in this Library as chiefs of these divisions, we have got to pay them the salaries that are paid in Boston and other large cities. We are entitled to good men in the first place, and these good men are entitled to good salaries. That is all your committee proposed to do, and we did it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my desire was to bring out the reason for this increase. I do not intend to insist upon the point of order, because I am willing to yield my judgment to that of the Committee on Appropriations; but what I do wish to call attention to is the fact that this not being under the civil service and appointments not being made from an eligible list, these salaries are increased without difficulty, because perhaps the people in the offices over there are appointed on the solicitation of members of the House and of the Senate.

Mr. McCLEARY. The gentleman will pardon me one moment. I think that the reflection which the gentleman at the close of his remarks has seen fit to make is very unjust. The membership of the Committee on Appropriations and the membership of the Committee on the Library, the two that have to do with this matter, are scrupulously careful not to urge their desires on the Librarian, and if there is any man in the service of the Government free to use his judgment and select the best men in the market for the money he has it is the Librarian of Congress.

Mr. MANN. I did not mean to reflect on the Committee on the Library or the Committee on Appropriations. I think as a rule they are less likely to secure any places in the Library than certain other gentlemen in this building, in another portion of it, are likely to secure. This end of the Capitol does not get much of that kind.

Mr. McCLEARY. We make it a rule to scrupulously avoid urging upon Mr. Putnam any of our desires in such matters.

Mr. MANN. The truth remains that the moment you leave an office out of the classified service and make the appointments in the manner these appointments are made, increases of salaries are asked for and obtained. If this office was in the classified service it would not be asking for the increase.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Do you mean to say that the pressure is any greater from those who are not in the classified service than those who are in the classified service?

Mr. MANN. The pressure may be no greater, but the effect is greater.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, if the gentleman will take this appropriation bill he will find more increases in the classified places than he will find in the nonclassified places. And I want to say right here, Mr. Chairman, that of nearly 400 applications for increases of salary, the Committee on Appropriations has granted a very few. We have been constantly stating to the members of this House that any one of these increases is subject to a point of order, and any member of this House might exercise his right and prevent the increase of a single salary upon this bill.

The Committee on Appropriations, dealing, as I say, with nearly 400 applications, many of them with merit, and I have no doubt these particular items are of a special merit; because if, as a matter of fact, there is a man in the Library of Congress who can be of special value to the membership of this House, who can furnish information to the membership of this House, who has spent a lifetime in preparing himself to promptly inform members upon questions that they desire information on, it is this gentleman.

When the Librarian finds that he is getting $1,300 less than he formerly received at Boston, and he is about to lose his services, he urges this increase. Why? He is of no especial value to the Librarian, except that he makes the Library useful by being able to furnish the members of Congress the information they desire and furnish it promptly.

Mr. McCLEARY. Put them in the way of getting it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes; put them in the way of getting it. Taking into consideration the recommendation of the Library and many members of Congress who have had occasion to use this man, this salary was increased. The gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from Georgia, or any other State, may take the increase out by a single point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly satisfied with the explanation that has been made upon this point, and I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise temporarily for the purpose of putting a bill into conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOUD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10847, and had come to no resolution thereon.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the urgent deficiency bill with Senate amendments, and nonconcur in all the Senate amendments, except amendment numbered 58, and to concur in that amendment with an amendment, and to ask for a conference on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, asks unanimous consent to take up the urgent deficiency bill, to nonconcur in all the amendments except No. 58, and to concur in that amendment with an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not know what that amendment is, Mr. Speaker, and I see none of the minority members of the committee here.

Mr. CANNON. This is the urgent deficiency bill, with a whole lot of Senate amendments, and I want to get it into conference as early as possible.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But why pick out one amendment; why not nonconcur in all?

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman will be satisfied with this course.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I would like to hear it read.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois is to nonconcur in all the amendments except Senate amendment 58.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have that amendment reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

(58) Page 47, after line 14, insert:

"For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $20,000."

That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58 with an amendment as follows:

Add to said amendment the following:

"Provided, That hereafter appropriations made for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives or the Senate shall not be used for the payment of personal services except upon the express and specific authorization of the House or Senate in whose behalf such services are rendered. Nor shall such appropriations be used for any expenses not intimately and directly connected with the routine legislative business of Congress, and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall apply the provisions of this paragraph in the settlement of the accounts of expenditures from said appropriations."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking up the bill as requested by the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered to amendment numbered 58.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on concurring in amendment No. 58 as amended.

The question was taken; and the amendment as amended was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on nonconcurring in all the other Senate amendments.

The question was taken; and the motion of Mr. CANNON to nonconcur in all the other Senate amendments was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be printed with the amendments, and that a conference be asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the bill and amendments be printed, and asks for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CANNON, Mr. BARNEY, and Mr. LIVINGSTON.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 10847, being the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LOUD in the chair, for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10847, being the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for War Department: For Auditor, $4,000; deputy auditor, $2,500; law clerk, $2,000; 6 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 16 clerks of class 4; additional to 1 clerk as disbursing clerk, $200; 42 clerks of class 3; 64 clerks of class 2; 54 clerks of class 1; 10 clerks, at $1,000 each; 5 clerks, at $900 each; skilled laborer, $900; 3 clerks, at $840 each; 1 messenger; 3 assistant messengers, and 8 laborers, in all $297,300.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, page 43, strike out "16" and insert "17."
In line 10, same page, strike out "42" and insert "41."
In line 16, same page, strike out "3" and insert "5."

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MCCALL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3293. An act to increase the limit of cost of public building at Cumberland, Md.; and

S. 3287. An act to fix salaries of certain judges of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 8761. An act to declare the international railway bridge over the St. Lawrence River, near Hogansburg, N. Y., a lawful structure; and

H. R. 9315. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1670) granting permission to Capt. B. H. McCalla, United States Navy, to accept a decoration tendered to him by the Emperor of Germany.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5814) to provide for the execution in the Philippine Islands and in Porto Rico of deeds for land situated in the District of Columbia.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Light-House Board: For chief clerk, $2,400; 2 clerks of class 4; 2 clerks of class 3; 2 clerks of class 2; 4 clerks of class 1; 2 clerks, at $1,000 each; 10 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 1 clerk, $720; 2 assistant messengers; laborer, $660; assistant civil engineer, $2,400; draftsman, $1,800; draftsman, $1,560; draftsman, $1,440; draftsman, $1,200; in all, $39,800.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I offer the amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 18, page 50, strike out "$660;" and in line 24, before the word "dollars," insert "and sixty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at Chicago: For assistant treasurer, $5,000; cashier, $2,500; vault clerk, $1,800; paying teller, $1,800; assistant paying teller, $1,500; assorting teller, $1,500; receiving teller, $1,500; clerk, $1,600; bookkeeper, $1,500; 3 coin, coupon, and currency clerks, at $1,500 each; 15 clerks, at $1,200 each; messenger, $840; stenographer, $720; janitor, $600; and 3 watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $45,520.

Mr. MANN. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out, in line 9, after the word "thousand," the word "five" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "eight," so as to increase the salary of the assorting teller in the subtreasury at Chicago from $1,500 to $1,800 a year. The persons occupying the position similar to this at New Orleans, San Francisco, and Boston receive $2,000 per year; at Philadelphia the salary is $1,800 a year. In Chicago the present salary is $1,500. This salary was fixed years ago. This teller is obliged to stand the loss of any counterfeit bills which he may take; and in some years he has lost as much as $200 in this way.

This amendment proposes simply to fix the salary for this office at the same figure as the salary allowed at Philadelphia and at less than the salary paid at Boston, New Orleans, and San Francisco, where the business is much less than at Chicago. The Chicago business and the Philadelphia business amount to almost the same—$186,000,000 of annual receipts.

I have an amendment which I propose to offer in the same connection, to increase the salary of the receiving teller from $1,500 to $1,700, the latter amount being the same which is paid at the Philadelphia office, and less than that paid at these other and smaller offices.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I offer another amendment in the same connection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, page 62, after the word "thousand," strike out "five" and insert in lieu thereof "seven."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. In order to correct the aggregate sum named at the close of the paragraph, I move to amend by striking out, in line 18, "$45,520" and inserting "$46,020."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mint at Carson, Nev.: For assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $1,500; assistant assayer, at $1,250; in all, $2,750.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I reserve a point of order on this section. Before making it I wish to put an inquiry to the gentleman from Indiana in charge of the bill. I observe that a reduction has been made in the bill upon the estimates of the Treasury Department in regard to this item. Those estimates call for $2,000 as the salary of the assayer in charge instead of $1,500. They call for $1,500 as the salary of the assistant assayer instead of $1,250, allowed in this bill. They also call for a clerk at $1,500, not allowed in the bill, making in all a reduction of $5,000. Now, I ask the gentleman in the first place what authority the committee has to change a salary fixed by law. I understand that these salaries are fixed by law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the facts and information on which we base the figures in the bill. Mr. Roberts, the Director of the Mint, stated that the receipts at Carson last year were $277,000, and the cost of running the office about 4 per cent of the total receipts; at Denver the cost is 1 per cent; at Deadwood, 2½ per cent; at Seattle, two-fifths of 1 per cent; at Boise City, 1 per cent; at Helena, 1 per cent; at Charlotte, 1½ per cent.

Now, as the amount taken in at Carson was about the same as the amount taken in at Charlotte, we fixed the same salary at Carson as we did for Charlotte, upon the recommendation of Mr. Roberts, the Director of the Mint.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I find no such recommendation in the report of the hearings.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am reading from the hearings here.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand; but I do not find any such recommendation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. In fact, as the gentleman perhaps knows, the Director of the Mint has very often recommended that this office be abolished altogether; but in view of the former action of the House, when we once struck this provision from the bill altogether and the House put it back, we thought it was our duty to continue the Carson office, but to put the salaries on the same basis that similar offices are receiving.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman tell me what authority the Committee on Appropriations has for changing a provision of the existing law fixing the salaries of these officials at the Carson mint?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, we have the authority of the rules of the House. We have a right under the rules of the House to reduce these salaries or to strike the appropriation for Carson out of the bill altogether.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What rule do you refer to?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, the rule that has been in existence since Congress first convened.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like the gentleman to refer me to it specifically.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, the gentleman knows that it is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations to determine whether or not these salaries shall be increased or decreased where they are not fixed by statute.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; but that is the question. I understand that these salaries are fixed by statute. I ask the gentleman what authority the committee has for changing existing law in that particular?

Mr. HEMENWAY. As I understand, the ruling of the House has been, if the gentleman will permit me, that the Committee on Appropriations can not increase a salary fixed by statute, but the committee, under the rules of the House——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Why is that so? It is a change of existing law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is not a reduction also a change of existing law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole has repeatedly ruled that the Committee on Appropriations may bring in an appropriation of less than the amount fixed by statute.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the Democratic rule, the rule of the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to make the point of order regarding the salary reported in the bill, that it is fixed by law, and that the Committee on Appropriations have changed existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Nevada cite the Chair to the statute?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have not it before me, Mr. Chairman, but the estimates of the Treasury Department refer to Revised Statutes 31, page 649, sections 3496 and 3498 as the existing law covering this matter. If the Chair will indulge me, I will send for the statutes.

Now, reserving the point of order, I will address myself to the expediency of making this recommendation.

If my point of order is not sustained, I propose to offer an amendment increasing these salaries to the amounts contained in the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, as a reason for the very large reduction in the expenses of this office the gentleman says that the receipts of last year were only $277,000, and that the expenses constitute 4 per cent of those receipts. He says he has reduced the expenses of this office so as to equal the expenses of some other office having similar receipts. He also says that the Director of the Mint recommended this change. On the contrary, the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury make the expenses of this office nearly double those allowed by the committee, and in the hearing the Director of the Mint was questioned regarding the expenses of this office, and he said:

> This is the first year it has been as low as $270,000. It has not been below $500,000.
> Mr. LITTAUER. There is no prospect of its increasing?
> Mr. ROBERTS. Yes; there is. There is a good deal of prospecting going on in Nevada, and there is considerable prospect. If it does not recover this year I think it could be still further reduced or abolished.

So that the recommendation of the Director of the Mint was that the appropriation should continue for this year; that if the receipts did not return to the old average, that then the reduction should be made in these salaries.

Now, let me say a word with reference to the prospecting that is going on in the State of Nevada. It is something more than prospecting. This Carson mint was established near the Great Comstock, which supplied $600,000,000 of gold and silver to the world; and during the flourishing times of the Comstock it was not a mere assay office, but a great mint.

Now, it has been reduced from a mint to an assay office, and the business has declined as the product of Comstock has declined; but prospectors have been at work in the State, and in the great Tonopah, on the Carson and Colorado Railroad, a strike has been made directly tributary to the Carson mint. In a short time over 2,500 men have gone to that camp, and it is estimated that within the last month very nearly a million of dollars worth was taken out by men enjoying leasehold interests in these mines. These mines are going into the ownership of a great Philadelphia company, and it is intimated that the mines will be conducted during the year on a very large scale. Tonopah is referred to as the new Comstock in that region.

Now, I ask when the Director of the Mint states that they have reached the lowest ebb in receipts at that office, and also states that there is prospecting going on in the State, and recommends the appropriation contained in the Book of Estimates, and a reduction next year if the receipts are not increased, I ask if under that statement it is fair for the gentleman to urge this reduction now?

Now, the statute referred to is on page 985, in volume 31, and it fixed the salaries of the mint at Carson, Nev., "For assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,000; assistant assayer and one clerk, at $1,500 each; in all, $5,000." Then, wages for workmen and watchmen. But I observe that this is simply an appropriation bill, I judge, for the year, similar to the one under consideration.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think that is all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And therefore it is a mistake to refer to this statute as the law authorizing the salaries, for it is simply in an appropriation bill like that now under consideration; but I know that when the mint at Carson was established the salaries were fixed, and there is a mistake in this book of estimates in referring to this source as authority.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman has not yet shown a statute fixing the salary?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No, I have not yet shown any statute.

Mr. HEMENWAY. On page 180 of the hearings I notice that the Director of the Mint says:

> The situation in Carson is just this: The assayer there is Governor Colcord. He was appointed superintendent of the mint while it was a mint and then appointed assayer. I do not think he is a practical assayer, but I can not remove him, and so we have to have an assistant assayer at Carson.

In other words, you seem to have at the head a man who is not an assayer, and in order to take care of him you have to have an assistant who is competent.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations do not believe it is a proper thing to continue this appropriation for Carson at the amounts they are now receiving, in order that an incompetent man should be taken care of, and they do not believe it is a proper thing to continue it above the amount appropriated for Charlotte, where there is the same amount of business. If next year more business shall be done at Carson, I have no doubt the appropriation can then be increased.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But in the meantime you have deprived that office of the facilities for the business now coming in, the current business.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no; we continue the same force. We continue the assay office.

Mr. NEWLANDS. How can the gentleman say that he is doing that, when he cuts down the appropriation nearly one-half?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We only put it in line with other similar offices, with the office at Charlotte, where they transact an amount of business which is equivalent to that at Carson. We put the Carson salaries at the same amount as that at Charlotte and other similar offices. I do not believe the salaries at Carson should be so large, simply that this gentleman, whom I have no doubt is a very good man, should continue at the head, when he is not competent to do the work of an assayer.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Regarding Governor Colcord, I have to say that he was superintendent when it was a mint, and when the reduction was made to an assay office he was kept there as assayer in charge. I think the Director of the Mint is mistaken in saying that he is not a practical assayer. My impression is that Governor Colcord is one of the best-equipped men in the State and is an assayer as well as a practical miner.

Now, I have already shown that while the committee reduces the appropriations of that office to a lower amount than ever before, there is a prospect of a very large increase, an absolute assurance of a very great increase in the business of the office in the next fiscal year. Now, the gentleman says that this reduction would only cripple the office during that time, and the only suggestion of relief that he gives me is that after the office has been crippled one year—that is, the next fiscal year—a return can be made to the amount expended previously.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will permit, in place of increasing, the business of this office has been decreasing. There is no evidence that the business will increase. On the other hand, it will decrease.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But the Director admits that it is likely to increase. He says if next year the business does not increase a reduction can be made. The trouble is that the gentleman is not postponing the reduction one year to see what experience can be obtained regarding the work, but he proposes to cut down the assay office immediately.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We propose to provide for the office as it exists now. If a year from now the business of the office has increased, I can only speak for myself, but I will say that I shall be glad to put the salaries of the offices right in line with the salaries of other similar offices.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman permit me to offer an amendment to the section, and we will take a vote on it? I offer first an amendment to line 17, page 67——

The CHAIRMAN. What has become of the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will have to reserve that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it had better be determined before the gentleman offers his amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not able to refer to the existing law at this minute. The estimates refer to an appropriation bill which is similar to the one before us, and I think that is a mistake. I have no doubt at all that there was an original statute fixing these salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not see how the gentleman can offer an amendment while a point of order is reserved which may possibly throw out the whole paragraph.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the section be passed until I can find the original statute.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest to the gentleman that if his point of order was sustained it would leave the bill with no amount in for salaries; and so he does not want his point of order sustained.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I do want the point of order sustained.

Mr. HEMENWAY. But the gentleman can see that if the point of order was sustained the provision would go out and it would be left blank.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But if the point of order is sustained, I shall move to amend.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then, after all, the sole question would be on your amendment; so you can as well withdraw the point of order and proceed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the gentleman will accept the amendment, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will withdraw the point of order, I will not make any point of order against his amendment. I am willing the House should vote on it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the gentleman will accept the amendment——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will not accept the amendment, but I am willing the committee should vote on it. Otherwise, I ask for a ruling by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not want to rule if the gentleman from Nevada asks for further time; but the Chair has the statute before him and is ready to rule.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been the uniform custom of the House to appropriate less than the amount of the statutory salary. The House, of course, has a right in an appropriation bill to refuse to appropriate at all. There is no doubt but that this committee would have the right, and not be subject to a point of order, to leave this appropriation out entirely. That is a power that is reserved to the appropriation committees in Congress. The Chair thinks that has been the uniform custom, that the House has the right to fix the amount less than the maximum salary. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment. There are a number of amendments, and I will offer them at one time to this entire section:

On page 67, lines 17 and 18, strike out the words "one thousand five hundred" and insert the words "two thousand."

On page 67, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "one thousand two hundred and fifty" and insert "one thousand five hundred."

On the same page, line 19, after the word "dollars," insert "1 clerk at $1,500."

Lines 19 and 20, strike out "$3,750" and insert "$5,000," that being the total amount.

Lines 20 and 21, strike out "two thousand" and insert "five thousand six hundred."

Lines 23 and 24, strike out "one thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred."

I will state that this makes the total change about $6,700 in the expense of this office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman had better confine his amendments to the paragraph under consideration. The gentleman has proposed to amend paragraphs that we have not reached.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Can not the Clerk segregate the amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 67, in lines 17 and 18, strike out the words "one thousand five hundred" and insert "two thousand."

On page 67, in lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "twelve hundred and fifty" and insert "fifteen hundred."

In line 19, after the word "dollars," insert "one clerk at $1,500."

In lines 19 and 20 strike out the words "twenty-seven hundred and fifty dollars" and insert "five thousand dollars."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. As has been stated by the gentleman in charge of this bill, there has been a proposition by the Director of the Mint for perhaps four or six years back—at any rate four years ago and two years ago—to abolish this office and several others, on account of the simple fact that they are not necessary, and their maintenance is an unnecessary expense to the Government. But let me say to the gentleman from Nevada that instead of abolishing this office, which perhaps for good reasons ought to have been done, the committee have simply cut down the expenses of that office $6,700, the reduction which the gentleman is now seeking to do away with by his amendment. In the hearings before the committee I asked this question of the Director of the Mint:

If the office at Carson City was abolished, how could those people be accommodated? What is the next place?

The answer of the Director of the Mint was:

A great part of the product—more than goes to Carson City—goes to San Francisco now.

Before our committee it was developed that this is an unnecessary expense. I do not want to put this proposition upon the ground that the assayer is either competent or incompetent. I want to put it on the ground that we have no use for this assay office; that is about the truth of it. On account of the mining regions contiguous to San Francisco we are compelled to keep that mint alive; but the whole truth of the case is that the silver business, under the single gold standard, has died out, and that is the trouble with the whole State of Nevada. Your committee is not responsible for this. We may sympathize ever so much with our friends from that State. I do so, I am sure. I do not think that the business ought to have been crippled in that way. I am a double-standard man, and expect always to be; but the facts are just as I have stated. With the very small amount of work done for the Government at that point and the little results shown for that work, it costs three or four times as much to do this work as it does at neighboring assay offices.

I appeal to the gentleman from Nevada to say whether the committee has not done fairly well with him. Instead of attempting to abolish the office, we have proposed simply this reduction of certain salaries. We are charged with the duty of making reductions wherever it can be done. We are bound to recommend reductions when in our opinion they are necessary; and such recommendations ought to be made independently of any party affiliation or any local partiality or bias. We are in honor bound to do it. We have presented this case in a straightforward, business-like way, and I think the gentleman from Nevada must be convinced that he ought to accept our action in good faith; for it has been taken in good faith.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] says that the work now done at Carson City can be done at San Francisco. But, sir, San Francisco is nearly 3,000 miles away from Carson. It is 600 miles from the eastern part of our State. It is about 400 miles from the camp of Tonopah, to which I referred, which is developing as the second Comstock of that region.

Now, I ask the gentleman whether he regards it as a matter of convenience to the miners and prospectors of that region to compel them to send their specimens and their ores hundreds of miles in order to be tested when the test could be applied at a Government office conveniently accessible?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to the gentleman that the Government could ship its bullion from his locality to Philadelphia or some other point where there is a mint? It might make a large amount of saving by skipping the assay office at Denver. The amount of assaying that is done there is purely a matter of accommodation for the people of that locality. That office does not mint anything. The Government could make money by shipping the bullion to Philadelphia or San Francisco.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If this metal is shipped to Philadelphia or San Francisco, a heavy charge for expressing must be paid. But why should we by such a system build up mints 3,000 miles away from the mines?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me ask the gentleman one question. With the appropriation carried by this bill can the work be properly done there and the parties doing the work properly sustained?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think so, and I do not believe the Director of the Mint thinks so. On the contrary, he advised the committee against this reduction. Let me read from some remarks which did not catch my eye when I read it before. He was asked by Mr. HEMENWAY:

There is no reason why Carson City should not be put on the same basis as Charlotte, is there?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think I would hesitate to do that this year.

Now, who is the business man in charge of these matters? Is it the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]? No; each one of them will confess with the utmost candor that he knows nothing about the business, either of minting or assaying. Who is charged by the Government with the responsibility of this work? The Director of the Mint, and when the question is asked him by Mr. HEMENWAY as to whether this reduction can not be made corresponding to the expenditure made at Charlotte, a reduction which has been made in the bill here pending, the Director of the Mint says he would not do it this year, that he would hesitate to do it this year. Is it not to be assumed that he hesitates to do it because it is a business proposition? Has the Carson mint ever been the subject of humanitarianism or liberality or generosity at the hands of the Federal Government? Why, it has been gradually crippled by the recommendation of the Director of the Mint, and when the Director of the Mint, who has been steadily cutting down operations there, asks the Committee on Appropriations to wait a year before taking action upon this matter, I assume that it is his business judgment, and business judgment alone, that controls him.

I ask for a vote.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I desire to say a word before the vote is taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want the House to understand this proposition. It is not proposed to cripple the Carson assay office, but it is proposed to put it on the basis that other similar assay offices are upon. The Director recommended that it be abolished altogether, and has repeatedly made that recommendation, but we did not believe it was proper to abolish it for the very reason that the gentleman states, that it was an accommodation to the people of that locality. So we put it on the same basis that Charlotte is put on, and other assay offices that handle the same amount of money.

Why, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that it costs 4 per cent on every dollar that goes through the Carson assay office now—twice the amount of interest that we pay on Government loans. While we are only paying 2 per cent interest on the money we borrow, yet for every dollar of money that we handle through that assay office it costs us 4 per cent.

It only costs us a little over one and a half per cent at Charlotte. They are both doing about the same amount of business now. What reason is there why this House should give to the officers at Carson extravagant salaries and hold the officers at Charlotte down to reasonable salaries? There is absolutely no business reason for it, and I hope the House will not do it. The business out there will not be crippled. The assay office will go on. Its officers will have the same salaries that officers in similar assay offices have in this country, and there is no reason why business there should not move along as smoothly as in other assay offices in this country, and there is absolutely no reason why salaries out at Carson should be away up and salaries at Charlotte away down.

Why, even the salaries at Charlotte have cost us nearly 2 per cent on every dollar we handle, and we are maintaining that office simply for the accommodation of the people of that locality, just as we maintain the office at St. Louis for the accommodation of people in that vicinity, although at an expense to the Government of more than 2 per cent for every dollar that goes through the office.

I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me say just a word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent to speak for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to speak for two minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope the two minutes will be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The gentleman says that the Director of the Mint sometime ago recommended the abolition of this assay office. I believe he recommended the abolition both of the mint and the assay office at that point. That was true, but the House reversed his judgment then. What is the judgment of the Director of the Mint now? That is the question, not what was his recommendation three or four years ago, when Nevada was at the very lowest ebb of its development. What is his recommendation now in view of the existing conditions? Why, he recommends the continuance of this appropriation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentlemen allow a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Were not the receipts at Carson last year less than they have ever been in the history of that assay office?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true; but the Director of the Mint states his reasons for a continuance of this appropriation, saying that there is a great deal of prospecting going on there. He minimized the real condition. There is not only a great deal of prospecting going on, but there is actual bona fide development of the mineral wealth of that State.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] says that the silver mining has been killed. So it has; but the people of that State, summoning all their energies, have taken to gold mining, and the gold output of that State has steadily increased, until this last year I believe it was nearly $6,000,000. Now the gentleman appeals to this House to sustain the Director of the Mint upon a recommendation made four years ago, and I appeal to this House to sustain the recommendation of the Director made to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 45.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] and the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 66.

So the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

For wages of workmen and watchmen, $2,000.
For incidental and contingent expenses, $1,000.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my other amendment, as I have ascertained the sense of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assay office at Seattle, Wash.: For assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,500; chief clerk, $1,800; 1 clerk, $1,600; 1 clerk, $1,500; 1 clerk, $1,400; 1 clerk, $1,200; in all, $10,000.
For wages of workmen and assistants, $27,000.
For incidental and contingent expenses, including rent of building, $9,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, page 73, strike out "two" and insert "three;" and strike out "five hundred."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order that this is a change of existing law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman desires.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to compare the business of this office and the business of the assay office and mint at Denver, Colo., because that is the one with which a comparison can properly be made. The effect of this amendment is to raise the salary of the assayer in charge of the office at Seattle, who receives a salary of $2,500 to perform the duties of assayer and also the duties of melter. Now, at the mint and assay office in Denver, Colo., they have an assayer who receives $3,000; they also have a melter who receives $2,250. So that the difference between the salaries of the two offices, for the business performed at the mint and performed at Seattle, is $2,750 more at Denver than at Seattle for the same service.

I desire to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the amount of business done at these two offices; and I think that that business shows the justice of this amendment, and that the officer at Seattle who performs the duties of both assayer and melter should receive at least as much as the assayer at Denver—$3,000.

Now, the net earnings of the office at Seattle in 1900 were $26,211.40; at Denver, $22,197.66, or $4,000 more at Seattle than at Denver. The net earnings in 1901 at Seattle were $40,598.74; at Denver, $23,587.64—nearly $20,000 more earnings at the assay office at Seattle than at the assay and mint at Denver, Colo.

Now, then, notice the business by way of deposits at these two offices. At Seattle the deposits in 1899 were $6,550,698.16; at Denver, $21,180,138.28. In 1900 the deposits at Seattle were $13,747,011.04, or an increase in that year of $7,000,000; at Denver, Colo., the deposits were $17,098,424.96, or a decrease of $4,000,000. The deposits in 1901 at Seattle were $21,707,166.29; at Denver, $18,233,947.35. In other words, while in 1899 the business in deposits at Denver, Colo., was about $15,000,000 more than at Seattle, in the year 1901 the business at Seattle was $3,000,000 more than the business at Denver, Colo.

The statistics of the manufacture of bars of gold and silver at these two offices is in the same proportion. I call all these figures to your attention. The amount of bullion deposited in these two offices for this time was: At Seattle in 1899, 346,076 ounces; at Denver, 1,135,050 ounces. In 1900, at Seattle, 727,607 ounces; in Denver, Colo., 913,691 ounces. In 1901, in Seattle, 1,130,814 ounces; and at Denver, Colo., 975,262 ounces. Silver, at Seattle in 1899, 96,311 ounces; and at Denver, 54,083 ounces. In 1900, at Seattle, 180,580 ounces; while at Denver it was 85,519 ounces. In 1901, at Seattle it was 234,964 ounces; and at Denver, 76,946 ounces. Now, the total bullion for 1900 was, at Seattle, 908,187 ounces; and at Denver, 999,210 ounces. In 1901, at Seattle it was 1,405,778 ounces; and at Denver, 1,052,208 ounces of bullion.

These figures show briefly the amount of the business done.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What has caused that great increase at Seattle?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It comes from Alaska. It is bullion coming in from Alaska.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like two or three more minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If I may be allowed to do so, I will yield the gentleman two or three minutes of my time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman be extended for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to call attention to the expense of conducting this office to the Government of the United States. That has already been adverted to by the gentleman from Indiana. The expense at Seattle during the last year was only two one-hundredths of 1 per cent on a dollar, less than any other assay office in the United States. It seems to me that, in view of the continued phenomenal increase in the business of this office, as shown during the last three or four years, and the increase this year and the amount of business done here compared with the amount at Denver, it would be an act of justice that the official who looks after these matters at Seattle should have at least the amount given the assayer at Denver, when he performs not only the duties of assayer, but the duties of melter also. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point of order.

It will be noticed here, also, that the assistant and laborers in charge at Denver are given an appropriation of $22,000. The assistants and men in charge at Seattle are given an appropriation of $27,000, showing the great responsibility that must rest on the assayer in Seattle, and I want to say that he is one of the best and most efficient assayers in the United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and if the gentleman from Washington will yield I would like to ask him a few questions, because I have another purpose in view. Will the gentleman state whether any of the gold that is brought from Alaska is assayed or minted in British territory contiguous to the United States or the State of Washington?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think perhaps there has been some assayed in the British territory this last year, because the British Government has offered a royalty to these people coming from Alaska who will have their gold assayed or minted at Vancouver or Victoria. I think that may have diverted some gold from Seattle, although I am not sure.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that that is absolutely true; they have offered one-fifth of the royalty to those bringing the gold to the British Columbia office to be assayed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman [Mr. JONES] if the matter of establishing a mint in this British territory is not being discussed, and what possibility is there that a mint will be established there?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not say positively. I suppose the gentleman is trying to lead somewhat up to the fact that there is a proposition to establish a mint is this country.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am trying to lead up to the statement that there is a proposition to establish a mint in Washington, and as the gentleman seems to be conversant with the facts that pertain to mints I thought I might get some information from him.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am willing to give the gentleman any information that I can. I understand that they are advocating putting a mint up in the British territory if they have not got one there already.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think it might be a good policy to establish a mint in the State of Washington?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I rather think so.

Mr. CANNON. Now, is not that a wise suggestion——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am glad to get a compliment from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). When the fact is that at any assay office in the United States the Philadelphia price for gold is paid. The Philadelphia price is paid at Seattle or any other office, and the whole expense of transportation to the mint is paid by the United States, and yet the gentleman from Tennessee wants a mint established up in Washington to keep gold from being minted at a mint that does not exist anywhere on the Western coast, in the British possessions. I say again, What a wise suggestion!

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here is what I had in mind, Mr. Chairman, that there is pending before the Coinage Committee, and has been reported, a bill for establishing a mint up in that part of the country. I am not the author of the wise proposition commended by the gentleman from Illinois. The bill was introduced by a very distinguished gentleman from the Republican side of the House. I thought if I could increase the money of this country by increasing the gold coinage, if we could induce all the gold from Alaska to come into the American mint and not go into a British mint and be coined into British money and stay in British territory, it would greatly benefit our country. A mint in the northwestern corner of the United States would induce the gold that came from Alaska to come into the mints of the United States and not go elsewhere, and thus add to our volume of money.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, if there is any gold in the Philippine Islands it will be brought by vessels to that northwestern corner of the United States. There is a great line of steamers coming from the Philippine Islands to Seattle or in that neighborhood.

Now, is it wiser or better to have a mint in the British possessions or have the mint over in an American possession? Mr. Chairman, in the "wisdom" of the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures, the committee think one should be established in the State of Washington where vessels land with the bullion. So, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has complimented the gentleman from Tennessee in relation to something that the gentleman from Tennessee did not merit, but which, from a patriotic standpoint, I heartily espoused in committee and shall when it comes before the House.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of intruding in the realm of this debate. The subject-matter of the debate had its beginning in the motion of my colleague [Mr. JONES] offering an amendment to this bill to increase the salary of the assayer in charge of the Seattle assay office from $2,500 to $3,000 per annum. With that proposition, so ably presented by my colleague, I am in full and hearty accord.

The subject, for the present, however, has taken a different trend and a wider range—regarding the advisability of the establishment of an additional United States coinage mint in the northwestern corner of the United States. As has been well said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], why should not such action be taken and such mint established?

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], it would seem from his remarks, thinks there is no need for any additional mints. He says that the miner can now get the same price for his gold at any assay office as he can get at the mint. In the first place, I deny that that statement is correct. All assay offices make a charge to all miners and bullion owners of one-eighth of 1 per cent of the value of the bullion over and above the charge that would be made against the same bullion if it was presented at any mint of the United States.

However, this is not the chief point that I desire to emphasize. The question involved in the establishment of a new mint in the northwestern part of the United States is bigger and broader than one-eighth of 1 per cent. If the contention of the gentleman from Illinois is correct, that because the miner could get almost as much for his bullion at the assay office as at the mint, then there would have never been any necessity of establishing but one mint in the entire United States. But there have been established five different coinage mints in the United States, and four of them are in active operation as mints to-day.

What reason was there for establishing any additional mint after the first one was established and in operation? Yet after the first one was established at Philadelphia there was another established at New Orleans; there was another established at San Francisco; there was another established at Carson, Nev.; there was another established at Denver, Colo. Now, then, if there are any reasons existing to-day against the establishment of a new coinage mint at Tacoma, those same reasons existed against the establishment of the last four mints that this Government has already established.

And all the reasons that operated for the establishment of those last four mints that have been established—I say that all those reasons exist to-day and operate with redoubled force in favor of the establishment of an additional coinage mint in the northwestern part of the United States. A bill for the establishment of that new mint has been introduced by myself during this session of Congress, it has been fully considered by the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee of this House, and favorably reported by that committee to this House.

It is very easy for gentlemen to stand up here and glibly declaim that no reasons exist for the establishment of a new mint in that region. It is a fact that the natural trend and flow of the gold bullion coming down from Alaska is toward the American side and not toward the British Columbia side. The citizens and officials of British Columbia have tried in a dozen different ways to turn the gold which now reaches the American side and is being converted into American eagles—to turn it toward the British Columbia side, where it will be coined into English sovereigns.

Any man who knows anything about mining camps or mining life knows that the place where the miner turns his crude product—the bullion and the dust—into coin is the same place where in all human probability he spends his money and buys his supplies. These are the reasons that have actuated the British Columbia government in establishing a magnificent assay office just across the American border, and these are the reasons that are actuating them in their purpose and desire to establish a branch British mint in that locality. For heaven's sake, are there not as many reasons existing why the American Government should protect the trade of its merchants and retain the flow of gold toward our shores as there are reasons why the British Columbia government should aid its citizens and their trade by filching our gold?

I say this question is broader than mint, and bigger than assay office. It is a question of the supremacy of trade. This Government has never been slow or negligent in protecting its trade or the product of its citizens. Whenever it is necessary to protect the product of some New England factory, men will rise up in this House and cry out for legislation, and we have always voted with you to help maintain your trade and protect your product. We do not expect less help from you when our trade or our product is menaced than we accorded to you under similar circumstances. I shall not talk longer on this question now, but when the proper time arrives I expect to have some pertinent remarks to make on this highly interesting subject.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know that I can say anything against the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any law on this subject?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The law fixes the salary of this officer.

The CHAIRMAN. And this would be an increase?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to sustain the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT IN THE TERRITORIES.

Territory of Alaska: For governor, $5,000; 3 judges, at $5,000 each; 3 attorneys, at $3,000 each; 3 marshals, at $4,000 each; 3 clerks, at $3,500 each; in all, $51,500.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "five" in the first line and inserting "three," so as to make it read "the salary of the governor of Alaska, $3,000," instead of $5,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order that this amendment changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The amendment was read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana raise a point of order?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order that this amendment changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am not surprised at the ruling of the Chair, because it is in keeping with a like ruling of the Chair a few minutes ago.

If we can reduce the salary of a mint officer, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] contended successfully a few moments ago, maybe, possibly, we can reduce the salary of a governor.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House, in all candor, to the fact that the salary of the governor of this Territory of Alaska was raised—I believe I state the fact—without any request from the governor of the Territory, Mr. Brady, whom I happen to know. I opposed the increase when it was made. The salary was formerly $3,000.

Mr. Chairman, let us take some of the States of this great Union, and what do we find as to this question of governor's salary? In Oregon the salary of the governor, whose duty it is to attend to the execution of the laws of the State, to call special sessions of the legislature, to write messages, and to perform the various other functions of the chief executive, is only $1,500 a year. The salary of the governor of Vermont is only $1,500. And, sir, the great State of Maine, which has sent so many of her illustrious sons to this House, is only $2,000. It is to be remembered that the distinguished and lamented Dingley served as governor of that State, and that we have to-day as members of the House two of her ex-governors—Governor Burleigh and Governor Powers. Then turn to the State of Georgia, and what do we find? The governor's salary is $2,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. And we are ashamed of that salary.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You are not ashamed of your governor.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I have never seen a Democrat from your State who was ashamed of the governor of that State, and to-day you have a great number of distinguished men who are candidates for the governorship of Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. But we are ashamed of the salary.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There may be perquisites that gentlemen do not know anything about.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not know anything about that, of course. But let me say in continuation that when we turn to the State of West Virginia we find the salary of the governor $2,000. And the State of Delaware pays her governor only $2,500. The governor of South Dakota receives $2,500, the governor of Nebraska $2,500. The governor of the great State of Iowa, that furnishes the Speaker of this House; that furnishes some of the ablest men in this House on the Republican side—the governor of that State receives only $3,000 a year. Yet we get from that State the new Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, who served that State as governor for the sum of $3,000 a year. We get men of that caliber for that salary in that great State, and many in Iowa wanted the honor of that office when ex-Governor Shaw was nominated first.

Go to the State of North Carolina, and we find there the salary of the governor is $3,000. The salary of the governor of North Dakota is $3,000. So that out of the entire number of States in this Union we find, I believe, that there are 28 governors of States who receive less than the governor of the Territory of Alaska.

Why should this be, Mr. Chairman? She has no legislature. She has no recommendations to make to any local congress. He simply writes an executive letter down here stating the condition of Alaska, once in two years, and still we continue to misrule Alaska legislatively and juridically.

Again, Mr. Chairman, for years we have been paying our Territorial governors salaries even greater than some of these States are paying, particularly Oregon, Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine, Georgia, Utah, West Virginia, Delaware, the Dakotas, and Nebraska. All of them receive less than the governors of our Western Territories. I will insert the table I have read from, as follows:

Salary paid the governor of—
Philippine Islands	$20,000
New York	10,000
Pennsylvania	10,000
Alaska	5,000
Oregon	1,500
Vermont	1,500
New Hampshire	2,000
Maine	2,000
Georgia	2,000
Utah	2,000
West Virginia	2,000
Delaware	2,500
South Dakota	2,500
Nebraska	2,500
Iowa	3,000
North Carolina	3,000
North Dakota	3,000

Now, why should the Federal Government be extravagant in these matters?

But the story does not stop there. All the salaries of the officials, of the governors in these new territories, begun at a higher figure than ever before in any of our Western Territories, and I believe unnecessarily, and particularly in this instance. In addition to paying the governor—I believe this bill provides for paying the governor of Porto Rico $8,000—we find, over on page 57, a provision paying a salary of "$5,000 a year to a resident commissioner of Porto Rico." Where is this commissioner? What are his duties? What does he do? Who has heard of him, or from him before? Where are his reports? What are his functions? Does he sit in the House, or out in the corridor? I have never had the honor of seeing him or hearing of him. Does he write messages to Congress? I have never had the pleasure of receiving one nor hearing of one. Does he frame or suggest legislation?

Again, Mr. Chairman, what do we find in the Philippine Islands? While we do not pay the salary directly, we will help do it when your imperial tariff law, that is an outrage upon the forefathers of this country, upon our institutions, and upon ourselves, becomes a law. We will have to pay to get our products into that "domestic territory," over which our flag floats. We must pay a high tariff to the Philippine Islands government, and that goes into the Philippine Islands treasury, and from the treasury it goes into the pockets of the governor of the Philippines, $20,000. We could not possibly get a more honorable governor there than we now have.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I call for a division, Mr. Chairman.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not hear the announcement of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman contends that he would have called for a division in time if he had heard the statement of the Chair, the Chair will recognize the gentleman to demand a division.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Division, Mr. Chairman.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEWCASTLE, PA.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 605) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Newcastle, in the State of Pennsylvania, to report it with amendments.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it proceed to the consideration of the bill and put it on its passage. I do so for the reason that under the instruction of my physicians I am compelled to-morrow to leave the city for an indefinite time, and the bill relating to a public building in my own Congressional district and being similar to one which passed the Senate unanimously in the last Congress, I thought probably I could be indulged by its passage now out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It will be read to the Senate in full.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not, of course, propose to interfere for a moment with the present bill nor with the convenience or the very reasonable request of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, but I should like to take this opportunity to call the attention of the Senate and that of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who is in the chair, to one consideration.

We have brought before us a great many bridge bills and a great many bills for the construction of public buildings. They are very apt to come in near the close of the session, when the time of the Senate is exceedingly valuable, and very often interrupt, by reading a long bill of a good many sections, the business of the Senate. Sometimes the indulgence is asked when a Senator is in the middle of a speech, or an appropriation bill or some other important measure is laid aside for that purpose.

Now, it seems to me that we ought to have one general bill which should say that all public buildings shall be provided for by law, shall be erected and the property acquired in accordance with certain provisions, and put into that bill these formal matters, which are the same in all these bills. Then, whenever authority to erect a public building is granted, we can just provide that there shall be a public building at Pittsburg, Pa., for instance, the proceedings to be in accordance with the statute of so and so, and the cost to be so and so. That would dispose of the whole matter in one minute.

There should be also a bill prepared by the Committee on Commerce, providing that whenever leave is given by Congress to erect a bridge across a navigable stream, which is a way of interstate or international commerce, it shall be done on certain prescribed conditions, and then when authority to construct a bridge is granted it will be granted in a bill which will take one minute to read and three lines to express.

I desire to ask my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, to prepare such bills. They would save the Senate not only hours but days of time, added together, in every session.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I can not refrain from expressing my hearty concurrence. I wonder that these things have not been done before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Indiana?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds were, on page 1, line 7, after the word "apparatus," to strike out the word "elevators;" in line 11, after the word "apparatus," to strike out the word "elevators;" and in line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred" and insert "one hundred and twenty-five;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Newcastle and State of Pennsylvania, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $125,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

I ask that an order be made to reprint Senate report, No. 22, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, made January 9, 1884, by Senator Dolph from the Committee on Claims, touching the bill for the relief of the city of Glasgow, in Missouri, and the citizens thereof. All the copies of the report have been exhausted. It is an important report and consists of only 9 pages, and I hope that 500 copies will be ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 8581, being the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, before the Senate commences the consideration of the bill I desire to make a personal explanation.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield, Mr. President, for that purpose.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, at the close of the meeting of the Committee on the Philippines this morning Governor Taft, who has been giving the committee the benefit of his knowledge now for a number of days past, at the close of his statement said what I shall read, and I will state that it is transcribed from the notes of the stenographer:

Governor TAFT. Mr. Chairman, may I say one word, rather of a personal nature? I am sure Senator PATTERSON would not misstate my position in regard to anything that has occurred here; I know, of course, that he would not; and possibly a newspaper report which I saw as to what he said on the floor yesterday was inaccurate, for it put me in the attitude of criticising what my colleagues had done in my absence with respect to the passage of the treason and sedition statute.

What I said, and I think the record will bear me out, when Senator PATTERSON suggested that the statute was passed since I left the islands, was that that was not true. I said no; that it was passed before I left the islands, but that I was on my back; that that put me at the disadvantage of not having heard the discussion, and therefore of not being fully advised as to the statutes by way of informing the committee. But if anything which I said gave the impression, as it seems to have done to Senator PATTERSON, that I was criticising the passage of that statute, or was intimating that the statute would have been different if I had been there, it is certainly an impression that I did not mean to convey, for one of the sections which has attracted most condemnation is the section with respect to independence, and while I did not draft the section, I certainly suggested its necessity to General Wright. While I should like very much to earn the approbation of Senator HOAR for humanity, I must decline to do so at the expense of seeming to avoid a responsibility which is mine as much as my colleagues I shall speak, of course, more at length upon these statutes further on, but I should like to make this statement now, not that I desire, of course, to impute to Senator PATTERSON any misstatement of my position, but to state fully what it is.

The testimony of Governor Taft, which I had in mind, while it may have been printed, had not been distributed to the members of the committee, and I presume it could not have been had until this morning. What I said as to Governor Taft's statement was not intended, and I hardly think my language would justify the assertion that it was intended, to be an accurately verbal report of the Governor's statement upon that subject. I was stating in my own way the impression his language made upon my mind at the time. The statement was made three or four days ago, I think. The exact statement by Governor Taft, giving the full question and the full answer, is as follows, as found on page 83 of the printed testimony of the committee:

Senator PATTERSON. In talking about parties, I should like to have you consume whatever time remains this morning in enlarging upon the facts that were brought out yesterday that there is a second party, one of several other parties, whose name is the Conservador party. The object of that party is first to seek for peace, and, after securing peace, then to agitate for independence. You stated that that party was making no progress in the outside provinces and but little inside. I asked you the question then whether that party came under the denunciation of the law that was enacted by the Commission, I believe since you left, which makes it a crime to advocate the independence of the Philippine Islands. You said you would enlarge upon that or give more information upon it. I should like to have the information about it.

Governor TAFT I do not think there is quite time enough to take up that general subject. I will only make this one remark—that if the Partido Conservador were the only element in the situation there that law would never have been put on the statute books, for the reason that the Partido Conservador never had but 50 members and never could get more than that. They are a pro-Spanish, proclerical party. The law was directed toward a very different thing, to which I shall refer, when I suppose I shall be given an opportunity to speak of those two laws, for which I did not vote, because at that time I was on my back, but with respect to which I have some views and some knowledge, though not so much as I should have had had I been present at the discussion.

I suppose, of course, Mr. President, that my construction of that language, in view of Governor Taft's statement, was not justified. This is what I said:

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to relieve at least one member of the Philippine Commission from a part of the odium of this law?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Governor Taft before the Philippine Committee had his attention directed to this law. He stated that when it was passed he was sick in bed, and that had he been there doubtless there would have been at least a modification of it.

It is evident from the testimony of Governor Taft that he did not in terms say that if he had been present doubtless there would have been a modification of the law. Governor Taft did not say that, and I suppose I was not justified, if I had been attempting to give his exact language, in using the words I did. Had I had the language of Governor Taft before me during the debate yesterday I should, of course, have read from his printed testimony, and then allow the Senate to determine for itself what it might reasonably be concluded he meant when he said that he did not vote for the law because he was then on his back, but with respect to which he had some views. Having done that, that was all I could have done.

The object I have in rising now is to say that I put in words the impression made upon my mind by the statement of Governor Taft that he had not voted for the law; that at the time he was on his back; that he had some views and some knowledge upon the subject, though not so much as he would have had had he been present at the discussion. It is due to Governor Taft to say that in view of his statement my impression as to his meaning was wrong, and that perhaps I ought not to have attempted to express an impression that the language of another conveyed to my mind; that I ought to have waited until the testimony was in print if I did not recall with accuracy precisely what the language was.

I desire to have the statement made by Governor Taft this morning before the committee made as public as possible—that he not only does not disagree with the law, but that he approves it, and that the section which received the greatest condemnation at the hands of different Senators yesterday was one that he believed was peculiarly necessary, and that he had something to do, as I understand the facts now, in having it put on the statute books of the Philippines.

I desire to disclaim any purpose whatever of misrepresenting Governor Taft. I only wish that the necessity for the explanation did not arise and that Governor Taft had, in fact, said what I believed he had said—that he had made a statement that comported with the impression that his language conveyed to my mind—but as he did not, I suppose that the discussion will have to proceed without even the partial indorsement of Governor Taft of the attitude taken by this side of the Chamber upon the subject of that particular legislation of the Philippine Commission.

H. B. MATTEOSIAN.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. QUARLES. I ask my friend the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me for just a moment, if he will.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the bill the Senator desires to have considered does not provoke discussion, I will yield; but I give notice that after that bill is considered I must insist on the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. QUARLES. This bill will provoke no debate. It is the bill (S. 567) for the relief of H. B. Matteosian. The reasons why the bill should be considered presently I will not even take the time of the Senate to state. The bill passed the Senate at the last session.

The bill (S. 567) for the relief of H. B. Matteosian was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay H. B. Matteosian, doctor of medicine, late delegate of the United States to the International Sanitary Commission at Constantinople, $600 per annum for each year he was so employed at said post, namely, from November 18, 1874, to September 1, 1886.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now ask that the pension appropriation bill may be considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8581) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while I have heretofore been very careful not to load down the pension appropriation bill with any general legislation, I feel constrained to offer an amendment to the bill at the present time, to which I think there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "prescribe," in line 8, on page 3, it is proposed to insert:

And provided further, That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in securing the passage of any special act of Congress granting pension or increase of pension; and any person who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, receive, or retain any compensation for such services shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall for each and every such offense be fined not exceeding $500, or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in explanation of that amendment, I desire to say that in the appropriation act of 1891 this provision was inserted and is the law:

Provided also, That hereafter no agent or attorney shall demand, receive, or be allowed any compensation under existing law exceeding $2 in any claim for increase of pension on account of the increase of the disability for which the pension has been allowed, or for services rendered in securing the passage of any special act of Congress granting a pension or an increase of pension in any case that has been presented at the Pension Office or is allowable under the general pension laws.

I was not aware until very recently that any allowance was made in the matter of special acts of Congress; but it seems that under the existing law an attorney may receive the sum of $2.

A certain attorney or justice of the peace in your own State, Mr. President [Mr. FRYE in the chair], has several times written me, making suggestions concerning men and women, soldiers and their widows, who, in his opinion, ought to have special acts of Congress passed in their behalf granting them pensions, in one instance sending the names of several such persons. The thing looked suspicious, and I wrote to one of the soldiers, and received from him this letter:

I have your letter of the 24th, in which you inquire if I have made arrangements to pay Mr. Williams any fee providing my bill passes Congress. Yes; I shall pay him $12. I am my own attorney, but Mr. Williams assists me in making out the papers.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that that particular man, a justice of the peace in a country town, is canvassing the soldiers of that community upon the promise of a fee for getting special pension bills through Congress; that he is, I have no doubt, troubling the Senators from that State, the members of the other House from that State, and he is certainly troubling the chairman of the Committee on Pensions of this body. He probably does not know that he is violating the law and making himself amenable to prosecution. If that practice becomes epidemic, as it is likely to, and other claim agents engage in the work of canvassing the soldiers, it is easy for Senators to understand what trouble will come to us here in this matter of special pension legislation.

Mr. President, the Committee on Pensions this year have gone to a good deal of trouble to obviate the necessity for this sort of thing. They have prepared a code of rules. They have even gone further than that, and have prepared two forms of petition—one for pension to widows and one for pension to soldiers. Every Senator can have copies of these petitions by making application to the clerk of the Committee on Pensions. Any woman who can write can fill out one of the widow's blanks, and any man who can write can fill out the other, and when so filled out they will give the committee all the information that is required. Of course, the committee will then go to the Bureau of Pensions and examine the papers, and upon the representations in the petition, which are required to be sworn to, and upon the facts as they appear in the Bureau of Pensions, the committee will determine whether or not there is any justice or equity in the claim. There is no need of any attorney being employed; there is no need of any justice of the peace being employed, and the purpose of the amendment is to prevent what I conceive to be a grave evil. In the first place, it takes money from the soldiers and the widows of soldiers that ought not to be paid, and, in the next place, it threatens to flood Congress with pension bills even greatly in excess of what is coming to us now.

If the amendment be adopted, it will go into conference, and while I will venture to express the hope that it may be retained in the bill, yet, if any good reason is shown by the conferees of the other House why it should not remain in the bill, of course it will go out.

Mr. COCKRELL. How many private pension bills have been presented at this session?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not ascertained that so far as the Senate is concerned, but I think I am safe in saying that in the other body there are between four and five thousand.

Mr. COCKRELL. A larger number so far this session than ever before?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I understand.

Mr. HOAR. I rose to make an inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire; but just as I was rising the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], not now in his seat made a suggestion which, with his leave, I will repeat, unless he wishes to make it himself.

The object of the amendment has my hearty sympathy, but it provides that the offense described shall be a misdemeanor, and that it shall be punished by a certain term of imprisonment. The statute distinction between a misdemeanor and a felony is that any offense punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary is a felony. So this description pro tanto abolishes this general statute distinction. I suppose the Senator from New Hampshire will have no objection to striking out the word "misdemeanor?"

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. And put in the word "offense." I do not want to make any captious objection, but I do not suppose the Senator wants to dig up here by the roots the distinction that is expounded by the courts. The distinction between a felony and a misdemeanor runs through the whole criminal law in a thousand ways. For instance, you can not ordinarily, where the common law is in force, join a misdemeanor and a felony in the same indictment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to remark that I certainly have no objection, but, on the contrary, will be glad to have the amendment made. I will say, however, in explanation of the amendment that I adopted the precise language of the act of 1891, which says:

Shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

I followed precisely the language of that act, which seems to have met the approval of a previous Congress.

Mr. HOAR. That act must have been inadvertently passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume so. Let the amendment be modified as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the word "misdemeanor" where it occurs and insert "felony."

Mr. HOAR. Or "offense;" I do not care which.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment read, "shall be deemed guilty of an offense." I think that "offense" would probably be a better term. It is suggested to me by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that the matter of imprisonment might well go out of the amendment, making the punishment merely a fine. I quite agree with that.

Mr. HOAR. No; that should not go out.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well, then, let it remain.

Mr. HOAR. I rose to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether the committee had considered, or are likely to consider, the increase in the rate of pensions for total blindness. I have had my attention called to some cases during vacation and to one or two since I came here. I wish to speak with great diffidence about this matter, which has been considered so thoroughly by the Senator and his committee, but I think there is a pretty general feeling that at some time, when our condition warrants it, there might be a little more liberal grant for total blindness.

Mr. GALLINGER. In that connection, Mr. President, I will say that when I was a member of another body my sympathies and interest were attracted toward two classes of pensioners in particular. One was those who had lost both hands and the other those who had lost both eyes. I introduced a bill in that body increasing the pension of soldiers who had lost both hands. Upon investigation I was surprised to find that there were only 22 or 23 soldiers—and that was fifteen years ago—who had lost both hands in the service of the Government. There was no difficulty in securing the passage of that bill, and it became a law. When we started to make an investigation in regard to those who had lost both eyes, I was equally surprised to find there were several thousand of them and that the increased appropriation would be very large—I have forgotten how much—but so large that I have never since pressed it.

Mr. President, the difficulty about that matter is this: First, the increased appropriation will be very considerable, and next, the soldiers who are totally deaf are pressing Congress with a persistency that would surprise all of you who have no direct knowledge of it, claiming that their disability is greater than that of any other class of soldiers; that they are unable to get employment. Of course a blind man is unable to get employment, and a man without hands is, as a rule, unable to get employment; but the totally deaf soldiers also claim that they are unable to get employment, and that their allowance is so small that they ought to have an increase. A blind man gets $72 a month; a man without hands gets, under the law passed in 1887 or 1888, $100 a month; and the totally deaf man $30 a month, much less, it will be observed, than that for the blind man or the man without hands. These soldiers, as I have said, are pressing their claims with great earnestness.

Another class who have been insistent and persistent are the soldiers who have lost limbs in the service of the Government, and with whom we all sympathize. Every year for fifteen years they have been before Congress. They send committees here to be heard by the Committees on Pensions of the two Houses of Congress. We hear them patiently and sympathize with them; and yet, if we should go into the matter of increasing their pensions to the extent they think they ought to be increased, it would take a very large appropriation to meet that increased charge.

We are doing the best we can. We sympathize with all these classes of soldiers. There are especial reasons why we should sympathize with the men who have lost both eyes; but I think we are not yet prepared to take up that question, and I hope it will not be pressed upon the committee at the present session of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, as modified, will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after the word "prescribe," in line 8, on page 3:

And provided further, That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in securing the passage of any special act of Congress granting pension or increase of pension, and any person who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, receive, or retain any compensation for such services shall be deemed guilty of an offense, and, upon conviction thereof, shall for each and every such offense be fined not exceeding $500 or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I offer an amendment to come in after the amendment just adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just adopted it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the act approved June 27, 1890, entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," is construed and held to include all persons who served for ninety days in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion and who have been honorably discharged therefrom: Provided, however, That the foregoing shall not apply to those who served in the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth regiments United States Volunteer Infantry who had a prior service in the Confederate army or navy.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President, this amendment is intended to construe the act of June, 1890, so as to give a pensionable status to those who served in the Confederate army and subsequently joined the Union Army. Under the provisions of section 4716 of the Revised Statutes those who aided or abetted the rebellion are not entitled to a pension. By numerous acts of Congress exceptions have been made to this section, until to-day it only applies to those who claim a pension under the act of June, 1890. Under President Harrison's Administration the then Acting Commissioner of Pensions construed the act of June, 1890, as repealing by implication section 4716 of the Revised Statutes in so far as it related to this class of people, but during the Administration of President Cleveland that ruling was reversed, and that has been the law until the present.

There are many people throughout the Southern States who served for a while in the Confederate army, who subsequently joined the Union Army and rendered faithful and efficient service, who are in destitute circumstances to-day, but they are inhibited from drawing a pension owing to the construction which has been placed upon the act of June, 1890.

I am satisfied in my own mind that the act of June, 1890, by implication repealed section 4716 of the Revised Statutes in so far as it related to this class of pensioners; but the present Secretary of the Interior seems to entertain a different view with respect to the matter, and it is in order that we may have a construction of the act of June, 1890, that I offer this amendment. I will ask the Secretary to read a portion of the report which I made heretofore, which will give us a historical statement as to the different amendments which have been made to section 4716 by Congress heretofore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read from the report submitted by Mr. PRITCHARD September 14, 1899, as follows:

This resolution, if adopted, will give pensionable status to those who served in the Confederate army and subsequently joined the United States Army, a portion of whom are now denied the benefits of the act of June 27, 1890, on the ground that they aided and abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States. The inhibition relative to this class of cases is to be found in section 4716 of the Revised Statutes. The section in question has been amended by four separate acts, the first of which, approved March 3, 1877, provided that nothing contained therein shall be so construed as to apply to such persons as voluntarily enlisted in the Army of the United States and who, while in such service, incurred disability from wound or injury received or disease contracted in line of duty. The act approved August 1, 1892, makes similar provisions for persons who enlisted in the Navy. The act of January 29, 1887, grants what is practically a service pension on service performed during the Mexican war, expressly repealing said section so far as it conflicts with its provisions; and the act approved July 27, 1892, grants pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars which occurred between 1832 and 1842, inclusive; also repeals section 4716 so far as it relates to claims thereunder.

It was clearly the intention of the framers of the act of June 27, 1890, to pension the persons therein named who had served for a period of ninety days and who had been honorably discharged. At the beginning of the late war thousands of citizens residing in the Southern States by force of circumstances were compelled to join the Confederate army, and at the first opportunity left the Confederate cause and made their way through the lines, where they joined the United States Army and served the Government faithfully to the end. At that time the Government of the United States needed their services, and after having accepted the same it ought not to be heard to object to their former record.

The honorable Commissioner of Pensions, in a letter addressed to Senator Pritchard on the 3d day of May, 1898, among other things, said:

"It has been repeatedly urged that no good and sufficient reason exists why claims under the act of June 27, 1890, should be singled out and set apart from all other claims, or why a survivor of the Mexican war or one of the Indian wars who may have performed but a slight service should be entitled to a pension on account of such service, in spite of the fact that he subsequently aided and abetted the rebellion, when a man who may have been disabled by a disability actually incurred while in line of duty prior to March 4, 1861, or a man who, after having engaged in the rebellion for but a short time, and subsequently seeing the errors of his way, enlisted and performed faithful service for the Union, should be denied such status, and it seems that the question now at issue is as to whether the subsequent loyal and faithful service of such persons wiped out any charge of disloyalty which may rest against their records."

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President, I think we have reached that period in our history where we ought to repeal outright section 4716 of the Revised Statutes, but this amendment does not undertake to do that. It simply provides that the act shall be construed so as to give those who served ninety days and who were honorably discharged a pensionable status similar to that of those who did not serve in the Confederate army.

Some time since we gave General Lee a commission in the Regular Army. After that he was promoted. We also appointed General Wheeler in the Regular Army and then promoted and retired him. It does seem to me, in view of that legislation, that we can afford to give the men who for a while fought in the Confederate army and then joined the Union Army and rendered ninety days' service to the Federal Government the small pittance which I ask for them in the pending amendment.

I do not care to discuss this matter any further. I hope the chairman will not raise any objection to the amendment being placed on the appropriation bill. I have sought session after session to have this amendment enacted into law. The Senate has passed it three times. I think the Senate on one occasion repealed section 4716 outright, but on three different occasions the Senate gave its assent to the principles contained in the pending amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina a question?

Mr. PRITCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am very much interested in the amendment, because I think it is right, as I understand it. Does the amendment simply provide for the pensioning of those who went into the Confederate army under duress or to all who afterwards served in the Union Army?

Mr. PRITCHARD. There are no exceptions made. It gives pensions to all who were in the Union Army and served ninety days.

Mr. MITCHELL. No matter in what way they went in?

Mr. PRITCHARD. No, sir. It would be difficult, under the circumstances in our section, to state how a man entered. Some entered willingly, and some went in with the mental reservation that at the very first opportunity they would go through the lines and fight on the other side.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think there is a very large class of that kind of men.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Men who entered with the mental reservation?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. I sincerely hope the chairman of the Committee on Pensions will make no point of order against the proposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question for information. Did not the measure which passed the Senate, certainly once and probably twice, contain a provision that guarded it to a much greater extent than the present amendment does? Did it not contain a provision that the men must have gone into the Federal Army prior to a certain date, so as to exclude a very large class of men who were soldiers in the Confederate army and who came into our ranks but a very short time prior to the close of the war and when it was known to every intelligent man in the country that the Confederacy was not to be a success?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read again. I did not catch the distinction which the Senator is making.

Mr. PRITCHARD. All right. Then I will answer the question of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. COCKRELL. I supposed the amendment was substantially Senate joint resolution No. 8 of the present Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That the act approved June 27, 1890, entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," is construed and held to include all persons who served for ninety days in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom: Provided, however, That the foregoing shall not apply to those who served in the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth regiments United States Volunteer Infantry who had a prior service in the Confederate army or navy.

Mr. PRITCHARD. In answer to the question of the chairman of the committee, I desire to say that the joint resolution which passed the Senate contained a proviso that those who joined the Union Army subsequent to the 1st day of January, I believe it was, 1865, should not be entitled to pensions.

But, in reply to the suggestion of the chairman, I desire to say that if the amendment is changed so as to exclude that class of people a great injury and a great injustice will be done to a very worthy class of people.

It is well known, Mr. President, that thousands of men in western North Carolina and eastern Tennessee remained for months and months in the mountains, waiting an opportunity to go through the Federal lines in order to join the Union Army. These men lived in caves, slept on the cold ground in the mountains, and endured all manner of hardships rather than fight in the Confederate army; and when the Union Army invaded that section of the country they were there, ready and willing to take up arms in defense of their Government.

Now, I submit that it would be a grave injustice to that class of men to exclude them from the provisions of existing law. I do not think there would be any great number of people affected by it one way or the other, but I do know that there are some men living in my own section of North Carolina who would be affected by it, and I know of a number of men, probably in eastern Tennessee, who would be affected likewise.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PRITCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator state why the exception of the regiments enumerated in the amendment is made?

Mr. PRITCHARD. I will do so with pleasure. Those regiments were constituted of men who were in Camp Douglas and who volunteered in the Regular Army with the understanding that they were not to be required to fight against the South, but that they would go West and do frontier duty, and with the distinct understanding that they would never claim any bounty or pension. Such being the case, at the suggestion of the Commissioner of Pensions, I put in the provision in question.

Mr. MALLORY. They draw no pension whatever?

Mr. PRITCHARD. No, sir. They draw no pension whatever, nor have they asked for any, as I understand.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in reference to the proposed amendment, the Senator from North Carolina does not need any assurance from me that I have endeavored to be very liberal in all these matters of pension legislation. The Senator himself is a very useful member of the Committee on Pensions, and he has been a very helpful member to the chairman. When this matter was first proposed in committee, a bill was prepared—very carefully drawn, as I remember it—and I believe it excluded a very large class of soldiers who had had service in the Confederate army, but who afterwards did render some service to the Union cause. It occurred to the committee at that time, and I think the Senate took that view of it, that the service was rendered at a time when they knew very well that the cause in which they had first been engaged was not to be successful, and they came into the Union Army largely as a consequence of that belief. We passed that bill, Mr. President, and it went to another body, which did not take final action on it.

The Senator from North Carolina at the present session introduced the amendment which he has now offered, and which came to the Committee on Pensions. It was considered very carefully by the committee. I regret that the Senator was not present at the time. I think he was at his home.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Yes; I was.

Mr. GALLINGER. His absence was regretted by the committee, but the committee were unanimously of the opinion that it would be unwise legislation to incorporate a provision of this kind on an appropriation bill. If the Senator will present a bill, either in the terms of the present amendment, or, as I think it ought to be, a more guarded provision, the committee will give it careful and conscientious consideration, and I think the Senator will be able to get, as he did once or twice before, a favorable report on a well-guarded bill.

Mr. President, I have no discretion in this matter. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], who is kind hearted and large hearted and generous, says he hopes I will not make any objection to the amendment. The Senator from North Carolina expresses the same view. But, Mr. President, I have no discretion to do otherwise than to make objection. The committee of which I chance to be chairman has taken adverse action on the amendment, and for that reason it becomes my duty to prevent it going on the bill, if I can do so, and of course the most effective way is to make the point of order against it, which I feel constrained to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw the point of order and let me make one further statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; I am pleased to do so.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President, the distinguished chairman says he thinks the better course is to attempt to have this bill become a law by passing the Senate and going to the House of Representatives. I will state to my friend that I have pursued that course until I am fully satisfied that I can secure no relief from that quarter. I do trust that my friend will not make the point of order and thus preclude this class of people, because it simply amounts to dropping them from the pension rolls.

Since I have been on the Pension Committee I have supported every proposition to pension the Union soldiers. I have fought for every proposition that has come before the committee, and I have supported it in this body cheerfully, because I believe it was right; but I must adopt some means by which I can get this worthy class of people taken care of.

Does the Senator from New Hampshire make the point on the ground that it is new legislation?

Mr. GALLINGER. General legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I desire to submit this view in regard to that matter. As I consider it, this is not new legislation. It is simply a proposition to construe existing law with respect to the payment of money to certain classes of people, and it seems to me it does not come within the rule which the distinguished chairman invokes. The amendment simply proposes to construe the law which we are now passing, to place a construction upon it as to the manner in which the money shall be expended. Such being the case, it seems to me it is not new legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair reluctantly sustains the point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. As a matter of explanation, I desire to say—and I think the Senator ought not to press this matter at all—that I find the Senate, during the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, passed a joint resolution substantially in the terms of this amendment. It went to another body, and that other body amended it. I had the impression that the Senate had put on that amendment, but it seems otherwise. The other body amended it by adding these words:

> Nor to those who served more than one year in the Confederate army or navy, nor to those who, having had such prior service, enlisted in the military or naval service of the United States after the 1st day of January, 1865: And provided further, That no pension shall be granted for any disability incurred while aiding or abetting the late rebellion; and that no pension shall be granted under this resolution except on application therefor filed after its passage.

Mr. PRITCHARD. The House completely emasculated my joint resolution. It was not worth the paper it was written on when they got through with it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to say to the Senator from North Carolina that should the amendment go on this bill and a certain other body be still hostile to it it would be utterly impossible to keep it on. The conferees of the Senate would have to yield, and I think the Senator will see the force of my observation, that he would better have a measure carefully drawn and presented to the Senate, and if, in the wisdom of the Senate, it passes here, as I think it will, then do the best he can elsewhere to have it enacted into law. I feel sure that that is the wise course to pursue.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I desire to give notice now that I will see that not many pension bills are passed until something is done in this direction, in the future.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask unanimous consent to put upon its passage the bill (S. 1609) making an appropriation for the purchase from Forsyth County of a site and building for a post-office and other Government offices in Winston-Salem, N. C., and to authorize the sale of the present post-office site in Winston-Salem to Forsyth County.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. I gave notice day before yesterday that I should call up House bill 5835 immediately after the morning business.

Of course, I have given way to the pension appropriation bill, as I should have given way for any other appropriation bill, but I do not see that I can give way further. If I am allowed to take up my bill, I will then yield to the Senator from North Carolina. If not, I must object.

Mr. KEAN. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will also yield to me to secure the passage of a short bill containing only a few lines.

Mr. SIMMONS. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from North Carolina will allow me to get up my bill, I shall not object to the bill which he desires to have passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Now I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1609) making an appropriation for the purchase from Forsyth County of a site and building for a post-office and other Government offices in Winston-Salem, N. C., and to authorize the sale of the present post-office site in Winston-Salem to Forsyth County.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment in section 1, page 1, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "sixty," and in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty-five;" so as to read:

That the sum of $160,000 is hereby appropriated to be used and expended by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for the following purposes and no other: $125,000 of this appropriation for the purchase, from the county of Forsyth, State of North Carolina, of a lot of land 200 feet long by 200 feet wide, lying and being in Winston, N. C., and bounded as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM D. RUTAN.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SIMON], and after that I shall object to any further requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 903) for the relief of William D. Rutan.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the accounting officers of the Treasury Department to credit the account of William D. Rutan, late collector of internal revenue at Newark, N. J., with the sum of $1,350, being the net value of certain snuff stamps forwarded by him to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for exchange under the provisions of an act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, which stamps were lost in transit or otherwise and never accounted for.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISAIAH TUFFORD.

Mr. SIMON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3299) granting an increase of pension to Isaiah Tufford.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pension Isaiah Tufford, late of Company H, Twenty-second Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] desires to go on this afternoon. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], I know, wishes to offer an amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend the bill by inserting what I send to the desk, to come in after the word "prescribe," in line 3, page 5.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 3, after the word "prescribe," it is proposed to insert:

And all taxes paid upon such articles shipped to the Philippine Islands since November 15, 1901, under the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury of that date, shall be refunded to the parties who have paid the same under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and a sum sufficient to make such payment is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I will now renew the request I started to make before the Senator from Wisconsin offered his amendment, and that is, that we may have a new print of the bill as it has been amended by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bill may be reprinted as amended. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. TURNER addressed the Senate. After having spoken for nearly two hours—

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Washington kindly yield to me at this time, that I may ask for the consideration of a local bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

COURTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. VEST. I ask unanimous consent to call up a bill of local interest only, which it is necessary to have considered and passed now. It will lead to no debate whatever.

The bill (S. 2708) respecting proceedings in the courts of the United States in the western district of the State of Missouri was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend the several acts of Congress establishing divisions in the western district of the State of Missouri, so as to read as follows:

Persons charged with offenses against the United States in any division of the western district of Missouri may be indicted or proceeded against by information, as now by law authorized, in either division thereof where a grand jury is in attendance and at any session of the court. And pleas by such persons may be accepted in the court where such indictments are found or informations are filed, and in case of pleas of guilty by such persons, sentence of judgment may be pronounced by the court so sitting, the same as if such plea had been entered and such sentence imposed by the court sitting in the division where the offense was committed; and where pleas of not guilty are entered, such court may admit the parties to bail on recognizance taken therein.

SEC. 2. That where trial upon such indictment or information is to be had in the division where the offense was committed, the clerk of the court where such indictment is found or information presented shall forthwith, upon order of the court, transmit the indictment or information, together with a certified copy of the records and proceedings had in such court, to the clerk of the court of the venue, and upon the filing of the same in the latter court the cause shall proceed the same as if the indictment had been found or information filed in the court of venue.

SEC. 3. That any suit in equity or at law which shall be submitted to the court for final hearing, either in term time or in vacation, in any division of said district, may be finally determined by the judge to whom such cause may be so submitted at chambers in any division of said district, and the judgment or decree rendered by him therein shall be filed and entered upon the records of the proper division in vacation and have the same force and effect as if entered in term time. Upon the filing of such judgment or decree in vacation the clerk of the court shall forthwith notify, by letter duly posted to the post-office address, the attorneys or counsel of the respective parties of record. And the judge in vacation may grant leave to file motions for new trials, or in arrest of judgment, and bills of exceptions in such cases the same as in term time; and in reckoning the time for such filing of motion for new trial, and arrest of judgment, and bill of exceptions it shall be from the day when such notice to said attorneys or counsel shall have been duly posted in the mail by the clerk of said court.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY E. M'DONALD.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4988) for the relief of Mary E. McDonald.

The bill was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mary E. McDonald and Stephen C. Brown, owners of the McDonald hatching jar and McDonald universal hatching jar, $1,234.06 each, in compensation in full for the use by the United States of all hatching jars invented by the late Marshall McDonald, and for all rights in said jars now possessed by Mary E. McDonald and Stephen C. Brown, and for the right of the United States to hereafter use the patents on said jars.

It further directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mary E. McDonald, widow of Marshall McDonald, late Commissioner of Fisheries, $2,500, in full compensation for the use by the United States of the McDonald egg transportation crate, the McDonald improved cod hatching box, the McDonald hatching bucket, the McDonald trout can, and of all other inventions of Marshall McDonald, and for their transfer to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NASHVILLE, TENN.

Mr. BATE. With the consent of the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2086) to provide for enlarging the public building at Nashville, Tenn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

The bill was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the public building at Nashville, Tenn., now occupied as a post-office and for other Government offices, to be enlarged so as to make the building suitable for the further and better accommodation of the post-office, the plans and specifications to be drawn, with respect to the present building, so as to furnish to the post-office more room and better accommodations; the plans, specifications, and full estimates for the addition, enlargement, and improvement of the building to be previously made and approved according to law, and not to exceed in cost $100,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOLS OF MINING AND METALLURGY.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 634) to apply a portion of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands to the endowment, support, and maintenance of schools or departments of mining and metallurgy in the several States and Territories in connection with the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts established in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read in full for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. That seems to be a long bill, Mr. President, to be considered at this time.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] will be allowed to proceed now with his remarks.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope Senators will not object. The Secretary is almost through with the reading of the bill. It was reported unanimously by the Committee on Mines and Mining, and was before the Senate at the last session and the session before that. It will only take a moment to complete the reading.

Mr. LODGE. I shall ask, after that bill has been disposed of, that the debate may continue on the business which is properly before the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. I am much obliged to the Senator.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, but before concluding was interrupted by—

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, as I understand this bill it provides for appropriating the proceeds from the sales of the public lands for the endowment of certain schools. The Senate is aware that we have now on the Calendar a bill appropriating the proceeds of the sales of public lands for another purpose, which I hope to get up for consideration in a few days. I think the bill called up by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] will certainly create some debate, and that it ought not to be considered now.

Mr. LODGE. If the bill is going to create debate, Mr. President, I must object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, the pending legislation proceeds upon the theory that we have acquired, in an international as well as a constitutional sense, dominion and sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, and that we have the right to enact legislation for the purpose of taxing the industries and the necessities of the people of those islands. I do not believe such to be the fact. A late and a more careful examination than I had ever before given to the subject has only served to confirm me in the belief which I have entertained from the beginning.

But passing that by, and conceding for the sake of the argument that the Philippine Islands are ours, I say that this bill is indefensible, because it is contrary to and in conflict with the clause of the Federal Constitution which requires uniformity in the laying of taxes, duties, and imposts, and because it flies in the face of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the so-called insular cases, expounding that and other cognate clauses of the Constitution in their relation to the Territories.

Our Republican friends, with their usual industry and enterprise, have undertaken to appropriate those decisions to themselves, and I must confess that they have come very near to succeeding, because they have created an impression in the public mind throughout the country that a majority of the judges in those cases set the seal of judicial approval upon the Republican contention concerning the power of the Government in dealing with our new possessions when, as a matter of fact, a majority of the judges have not only not done anything of that kind, but if I read their opinions correctly, they set the seal of judicial disapproval upon the Republican contention in that respect.

It is impossible to read critically and intelligently the opinions handed down in those cases and come to any other conclusion. It is true that the judgment in one of those cases sustained a tax laid under a law enacted without reference to the uniformity clause of the Constitution, but there is a very plain and well-marked distinction between the judgment in a cause which merely settles the particular concrete thing in controversy and the reasons for that judgment which constitutes the decision of the court.

A judgment serves its full purpose when it decides, for instance, that a particular horse belongs to A which is in the possession of B, and directs that it shall be delivered back into the possession of A; but the reasons upon which that judgment proceeded will live and continue to have vital force as a rule of property between citizens so long as the system of jurisprudence which was expounded by the court continues to exist and have force in the jurisdiction where the judgment was rendered.

It is a fact, and a logical fact, paradoxical as it may seem, that the judgment of a court, of an appellate court, consisting of three or more members, is frequently found to be in opposition to and in conflict with the rationale of the opinions of a majority of the court. This may appear to be a remarkable statement, but it is strictly logical, and it is strictly true. Take, for instance, an action upon a promissory note. The defendant comes into court and pleads non est factum, want of consideration, and the statute of limitations. The case is taken up to an appellate court consisting of three members, Judge A, Judge B, and Judge C, and the case, we will suppose, has been tried in the lower court upon an agreed statement of facts, so that the appellate court is required to pronounce upon the merits of the case. Judge A holds that the note having been made, we will say, by an agent of the defendant without proper authority, was not the note of the defendant, but that it was upon sufficient consideration, and that the statute of limitations had not barred the action. Judge B holds that the note was not upon a sufficient consideration, but that it was the note of the defendant and that its recovery was not barred by the statute of limitations. Judge C holds that the action was barred by the statute of limitations, but that the note was the note of the defendant and that it was on full and ample consideration.

Now, what is the result? There are two members of that court out of three against the defendant on every contention that he made in that case; yet the result must be that a judgment shall be entered that he go hence without day. Upon the questions before the court, and upon which its decision necessarily depended, the court would stand thus: Was the note the note of the defendant? Yeas 2, nays 1. Was the note upon a sufficient consideration? Yeas 2, nays 1. Was the note not barred by the statute of limitations? Yeas 2, nays 1.

Thus upon every single proposition in that case the majority of the court will have pronounced against the law and the facts as contended for by the defendant, and yet the judgment must necessarily be in his favor and he be discharged out of court.

That is what I claim has taken place in the insular cases before the Supreme Court of the United States. Upon every single contention concerning the state of the law made by the Republican side here, upon every single contention necessary to sustain an unequal tax law for Porto Rico or the Philippines made there, a majority of the Supreme Court in the cases to which I have referred have pronounced, and it has been against the Republican contention.

I will now state what I understand to have been the decision of the court in the two cases of De Lima v. Bidwell and Downes v. Bidwell. Taking those two cases together, a correct digest of the opinions of the court is as follows:

Justice Brown held in his opinion that our newly acquired possessions are as much a part of the territory of the United States as any other territory possessed by us and not organized into a State, but that the Constitution was intended for the States, leaving Congress a free hand in the Territories, and that therefore neither the revenue clauses of the Constitution nor any other clause of that instrument, except such as go to the root of the power of Congress to legislate at all, have application in the Territories. That is the effect of his opinion in those two cases.

Chief Justice Fuller and Justices Brewer, Harlan, and Peckham, who concurred with Justice Brown in the De Lima case and dissented from him in the Downes case, held that Porto Rico was a Territory of the United States, and they held, further, that the revenue clauses of the Constitution and all of its other provisions applied to it ex proprio vigore, and in the same manner applied to all the other Territories.

Justices White, Shiras, McKenna, and Gray dissented in the De Lima case and concurred with Mr. Justice Brown in the judgment in the Downes case, but they concurred with him in no position taken in his opinion in either case. They held that Porto Rico was not a part of the territory of the United States within the meaning of our Constitution, and that it could not become such save by the action of the political department of the Government, either through a treaty providing for its incorporation and legislation by Congress which implied an acceptance of such treaty provisions, or by a formal act of Congress accepting it into the great American family.

They held, further, however, that once it became a part of the nation, either as a State or as a Territory, it was bound and privileged by all of the provisions intended to have application to the Territories of the United States, and particularly by that one requiring uniformity in the laying of taxes, duties, and imposts.

Now, what is to be deduced as the law from these opinions? According to five of the nine judges, Porto Rico became a Territory of the United States in the same sense as any other Territory immediately on the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain. According to eight of the nine judges, all such territory—that is, all territory that is such within the sense of our Constitution—is bound and privileged by all the provisions of the Constitution, including the provision requiring uniformity of taxation.

I dislike to take up the time of the Senate in reading long judicial opinions, but I deem it important to do so in this case to show the correctness of the position I have taken concerning the effect of these decisions of the Supreme Court because of the claim of our Republican friends that those decisions gave them a free hand in the matter of legislation for our newly acquired possessions. That claim has gone abroad to such an extent, and has taken such a hold upon the public mind, that I deem it important to show how utterly groundless and unfounded it is.

In the first case, that of De Lima v. Bidwell, the sole question was whether upon the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain Porto Rico became one of the Territories of the United States, and therefore not foreign country within the meaning of the Dingley tariff act, under which it had been undertaken to lay the tariff duties.

Judge Brown delivered the opinion of the majority of the court, which was concurred in by the Chief Justice and Justices Harlan, Brewer, and Peckham. His language leaves no room for doubt or contention as to what the majority intended to hold on the subject before them. It leaves no room for doubt or contention that a majority of that great court intended to hold, and did hold, that the island of Porto Rico was as much a part of the territory of the United States as any organized territory which we then held or over which we have ever exercised sovereignty.

After making an extended examination of the authorities relating to the subject, Judge Brown states his conclusions thus:

From this résumé of the decisions of this court, the instructions of the Executive Departments, and the above act of Congress it is evident that from 1808, the date of Mr. Gallatin's letter, to the present time there is not a shred of authority except the dictum in Fleming v. Page (practically overruled in Cross v. Harrison) for holding that a district ceded to and in the possession of the United States remains for any purpose a foreign country. Both these conditions must exist to produce a change of nationality for revenue purposes.

That is, there must be cession and possession.

Possession is not alone sufficient, as was held in Fleming v. Page; nor is a treaty ceding such territory sufficient without a surrender of possession. (Keene v. McDonough, 8 Pet., 308; Pollard's Heirs v. Kibbe, 14 Pet., 353, 406; Hallet v. Hunt, 7 Ala., 899; The Fama, 5 Ch. Rob., 97.) The practice of the Executive Departments, thus continued for more than half a century, is entitled to great weight, and should not be disregarded nor overturned except for cogent reasons and unless it be clear that such construction be erroneous. (United States v. Johnson, 124 U. S., 236, and other cases cited.)

But were this presented as an original question we should be impelled irresistibly to the same conclusion.

Further on, in the same line, this learned justice says:

It—

may do for the Territories what the people, under the Constitution of the United States, may do for the States. Indeed, it is scarcely too much to say that there has not been a session of Congress since the Territory of Louisiana was purchased that that body has not enacted legislation based upon the assumed authority to govern and control the Territory. It is an authority which arises not necessarily from the Territorial clause of the Constitution, but from the necessities of the case and from the inability of the States to act upon the subject. Under this power Congress may deal with territory acquired by treaties; may administer its government as it does that of the District of Columbia; it may organize a local Territorial government; it may admit it as a State upon an equality with other States; it may sell its public lands to individual citizens or may donate them as homesteads to actual settlers. In short, when once acquired by treaty it belongs to the United States and is subject to the disposition of Congress.

The theory that a country remains foreign with respect to the tariff laws until Congress has acted by embracing it within the customs union presupposes that a country may be domestic for one purpose and foreign for another. It may undoubtedly become necessary for the adequate administration of a domestic territory to pass a special act providing the proper machinery and officers, as the President would have no authority, except under the war power, to administer it himself; but no act is necessary to make it domestic territory if once it has been ceded to the United States. We express no opinion as to whether Congress is bound to appropriate the money to pay for it. This has been much discussed by writers upon constitutional law; but is not necessary to consider it in this case, as Congress made prompt appropriation of the money stipulated in the treaty.

This theory also presupposes that territory may be held indefinitely by the United States; that it may be treated in every particular, except for tariff purposes, as domestic territory; that laws may be enacted and enforced by officers of the United States sent there for that purpose; that insurrections may be suppressed, wars carried on, revenues collected, taxes imposed; in short, that everything may be done which a government can do within its own boundaries, and yet that the territory may still remain a foreign country. That this state of things may continue for years, for a century even, but that until Congress enacts otherwise it still remains a foreign country. To hold that this can be done as matter of law we deem to be pure judicial legislation. We find no warrant for it in the Constitution, or in the powers conferred upon this court. It is true the nonaction of Congress may occasion a temporary inconvenience, but it does not follow that courts of justice are authorized to remedy it by inverting the ordinary meaning of words.

Mr. President, there ought to be no doubt after the language which I have read from the opinion of Mr. Justice Brown that that member of the Supreme Court meant to hold that Porto Rico became a member of the American family as much so as any other Territory over which we have ever exercised sovereignty the moment the treaty of cession between Spain and the United States went into effect; and, holding a like opinion, the Chief Justice and Justices Harlan, Brewer, and Peckham concurred in that opinion, and thereby settled as a judicial fact that these territories are a part of the great American family and that they are entitled to the same protection which the Constitution of the United States was designed to throw around any other Territory.

We next come to the case of Downes v. Bidwell. It is there that the great contrariety of opinion exists. It is there that this peculiar but logical judgment which flies in the face of the opinions of a majority of the judges was rendered.

Mr. Justice Brown, with whom concurred Justices White, Gray, Shiras, and McKenna, did not in that case mean to depart one iota from any position that he had taken in the De Lima case. He did not yield his assent to the proposition of the four other judges that Porto Rico had not become a part of the great American family, or was not entitled to the benefit of the Constitution as much as any other one of our organized Territories.

But he took the peculiar and singular position, one which was not taken by any other member of the court, that the revenue clauses of the Constitution were not intended to have effect in any of our Territories, organized or unorganized, even those which we held at the time of the establishment of our own independence, or those which had been acquired since and erected into organized Territories; and it was by virtue of that proposition that he was enabled to concur in the rendition of judgment with the four members of the court who held that, although the treaty of peace made a cession of the new possessions to us, that that treaty did not invest the territory ceded with political rights, did not make it a member of the American political family until the political department of the Government had acted and either expressly or impliedly ratified the treaty.

I will read briefly from Judge Brown's opinion in the Downes case to show that he did not depart from the position taken in the De Lima case. He states the question to be determined in the Downes case as follows:

In the case of De Lima v. Bidwell, just decided, we held upon the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain, Porto Rico ceased to be a foreign country, and became a Territory of the United States, and that duties were no longer collectible upon merchandise brought from that island. We are now asked to hold that it became a part of the United States within that provision of the Constitution which declares that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

* * * * * * *

The case also involves the broader question whether the revenue clauses of the Constitution extend of their own force to our newly acquired territories. The Constitution itself does not answer the question. Its solution must be found in the nature of the government created by that instrument, in the opinion of its contemporaries, in the practical construction put upon it by Congress and in the decisions of this court.

Looking into all those sources of light, through which I shall not follow him, and thereby detain the Senate too long, Judge Brown reaches these conclusions:

To sustain the judgment in the case under consideration it by no means becomes necessary to show that none of the articles of the Constitution apply to the island of Porto Rico. There is a clear distinction between such prohibitions as go to the very root of the power of Congress to act at all, irrespective of time or place, and such as are operated only "throughout the United States" or among the several States.

Thus, when the Constitution declares that "no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed" and that "no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States" it goes to the competency of Congress to pass a bill of that description. Perhaps the same remark may apply to the first amendment, that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people to peacefully assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." We do not wish, however, to be understood as expressing an opinion how far the bill of rights contained in the first eight amendments is of general and how far of local application.

Upon the other hand, when the Constitution declares that all duties shall be uniform "throughout the United States," it becomes necessary to inquire whether there be any territory over which Congress has jurisdiction which is not a part of the "United States," by which term we understand the States whose people united to form the Constitution, and such as have since been admitted to the Union upon an equality with them.

And here is the gist of Judge Brown's opinion. The Constitution was made, as he says, for the States united, under the name of the United States, and has no application in its revenue clauses to any other part of the Territories of the United States.

Not only did the people in adopting the thirteenth amendment thus recognize a distinction between the United States and "any place subject to their jurisdiction," but Congress itself, in the act of March 27, 1804 (2 Stat., 298), providing for the proof of public records, applied the provisions of the act not only to "every court and office within the United States," but to the "courts and offices of the respective territories of the United States and countries subject to the jurisdiction of the United States," as to the courts and offices of the several States. This classification, adopted by the Eighth Congress, is carried into the Revised Statutes as follows:

"SEC. 905. The acts of the legislature of any State or Territory, or of any country subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be authenticated," etc.

"SEC. 906. All records and exemplifications of books which may be kept in any public office of any State or Territory, or any country subject to the jurisdiction of the United States," etc.

Unless these words are to be taken as meaningless, we must treat them as a recognition by Congress of the fact that there may be territories subject to the jurisdiction of the United States which are not of the United States.

Obviously Justice Brown means in this last sentence "not of the United States" in the sense that the United States is only, as he says, the States united.

In determining the meaning of the words of Article I, section 6, "uniform throughout the United States," we are bound to consider not only the provisions forbidding preference being given to the ports of one State over those of another (to which attention has already been called), but the other clauses declaring that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State, and that no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties upon imports or exports, nor any duty on tonnage. The object of all of these was to protect the States which united in forming the Constitution from discriminations by Congress which would operate unfairly or injuriously upon some States and not equally upon others.

The opinion of Mr. Justice White in Knowlton v. Moore (178 U. S., 41) contains an elaborate historical review of the proceedings in the convention, which resulted in the adoption of these different clauses and their arrangement, and he there comes to the conclusion (p. 105) that "although the provision as to preference between ports and that regarding uniformity of duties, imposts, and excises were one in purpose, one in their adoption," they were originally placed together, and "became separate only in arranging the Constitution for the purpose of style." Thus construed together the purpose is irresistible that the words "throughout the United States" are indistinguishable from the words "among or between the several States," and that these prohibitions were intended to apply only to commerce between ports of the several States as they then existed or should thereafter be admitted to the Union.

There could not be a more distinct and explicit enunciation of views than that which Judge Brown has here made. I do not agree that there is any confusion or any ground for misunderstanding in the opinions in the insular cases. When read understandingly and intelligently, they present their purport to the lawyer very clearly; and the purport of Judge Brown's opinions in these two cases was that, while Porto Rico became a part of the Territories of the United States by the act of cession as much as any other Territory which we now hold or ever did hold, the Constitution was made for the United States in the sense of the States united, and had no application to any of our Territories; therefore, that the clause of the Constitution requiring uniformity in taxation did not apply to Porto Rico nor, any more, did it apply to any other of our Territories. But the judges who united with Judge Brown in the judgment in this case proceeded upon no conclusion of that kind; they entertained no views of that kind; their views were diametrically opposed to those of Judge Brown upon each of those two propositions.

I shall not read from the opinions of the Chief Justice and of Mr. Justice Harlan in these cases. If I were undertaking to establish at this moment the correctness of the view which they contended for there, I could not supplement by a single word the magnificent presentation of the case made by them. I pass their opinions over because I am not arguing now whether, as a matter of law and logic, the Constitution does apply to those Territories. I am simply undertaking to show what the Supreme Court of the United States held in these insular cases, and how, holding as they did, it was possible to render the judgment that was rendered.

I turn now to the opinion of Mr. Justice White, who spoke also for three concurring justices, and the opening paragraph of his opinion shows that he did not unite with Justice Brown in a single position that that justice took. He says:

Mr. Justice Brown, in announcing the judgment of affirmance, has in his opinion stated his reasons for his concurrence in such judgment. In the result I likewise concur. As, however, the reasons which cause me to do so are different from, if not in conflict with, those expressed in that opinion, if its meaning is by me not misconceived, it becomes my duty to state the convictions which control me.

Sir, Justice White and the other concurring judges in the Downes case put their concurrence upon this proposition, that the entire history of the acquisition by this country of territory by cession from foreign countries showed that it was the view of the framers of the Constitution and those who had followed them in the administration of the Government, that a mere cession of territory to this country by treaty, being merely the act of the President and of the Senate, the treaty-making power, did not make the territory ceded a part of the Territories of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution, but that it required the action of the political department of the Government to do that, either expressly or impliedly. Hence they held that since the treaty between ourselves and Spain had not provided for the incorporation of the ceded possessions into the Territories of the United States, as other treaties ceding territory to us had done, that no action then taken by Congress could be considered as expressly or impliedly incorporating them.

The consequence was that they had not come into the great American family, but were held by us temporarily by a kind of intangible and shadowy sovereignty, under which we might legislate for them, but under which they were shut out from the constitutional guaranties which protect our other possessions.

I will read briefly from Judge White's opinion:

It is said, however—

Says the justice—

that the treaty for the purchase of Louisiana took for granted that the territory ceded would be immediately incorporated into the United States, and hence the guaranties contained in the treaty related not to such incorporation, but was a pledge that the ceded territory was to be made a part of the Union as a State.

The minutest analysis, however, of the clauses of the treaty fails to disclose any reference to a promise of statehood, and hence it can only be that the pledges made referred to incorporation into the United States. This will further appear when the opinions of Jefferson and Madison and their acts on the subject are reviewed. The argument proceeds upon the theory that the words of the treaty "shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States," could only have referred to a promise of statehood, since the then existing and incorporated Territories were not a part of the Union of the United States, as that Union consisted only of the States. But this has been shown to be unfounded, since the "Union of the United States" was composed of States and Territories, both having been embraced within the boundaries fixed by the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States which terminated the Revolutionary war, the latter, the Territories, embracing districts of country which were ceded by the States to the United States under the express pledge that they should forever remain a part thereof.

That this conception of the Union composing the United States was the understanding of Jefferson and Madison, and indeed of all those who participated in the events which preceded and led up to the Louisiana treaty, results from what I have already said, and will be additionally demonstrated by statements to be hereafter made. Again, the inconsistency of the argument is evident. Thus, whilst the premise upon which it proceeds is that foreign territory, when acquired, becomes at once a part of the United States, despite conditions in the treaty expressly excluding such consequence, it yet endeavors to escape the refutation of such theory which arises from the history of the Government by the contention that the Territories which were a part of the United States were not component constituents of the Union which composed the United States.

I do not understand how foreign territory which has been acquired by treaty can be asserted to have been absolutely incorporated into the United States as a part thereof despite conditions to the contrary inserted in the treaty, and yet the assertion be made that the territories which, as I have said, were in the United States originally as a part of the States and which were ceded by them upon express condition that they should forever so remain a part of the United States, were not a part of the Union composing the United States. The argument, indeed, reduces itself to this, that for the purpose of incorporating foreign territory into the United States domestic territory must be disincorporated. In other words, that the Union must be, at least in theory, dismembered for the purpose of maintaining the doctrine of the immediate incorporation of alien territory.

Further on the opinion proceeds:

It is then, as I think, indubitably settled by the principles of the law of nations, by the nature of the government created under the Constitution, by the express and implied powers conferred upon that government by the Constitution, by the mode in which those powers have been executed from the beginning, and by an unbroken line of decisions of this court, first announced by Marshall and followed and lucidly expounded by Taney, that the treaty-making power can not incorporate territory into the United States without the express or implied assent of Congress, that it may insert in a treaty conditions against immediate incorporation, and that, on the other hand, when it has expressed in the treaty the conditions favorable to incorporation they will, if the treaty be not repudiated by Congress, have the force of the law of the land, and, therefore, by the fulfillment of such conditions cause incorporation to result. It must follow, therefore, that where a treaty contains no conditions for incorporation, and, above all, where it not only has no such conditions, but expressly provides to the contrary, that incorporation does not arise until, in the wisdom of Congress, it is deemed that the acquired territory has reached that state where it is proper that it should enter into and form a part of the American family.

I have now read enough to show the line of cleavage between the opinion of Judge Brown in these cases and the opinion of the other judges who concurred with him in rendering the judgment in the Downes case sustaining the tax, Judge Brown holding that the Territories were a part of the United States in every sense that we have ever held Territories, the other members of the court holding that they were not in any sense Territories of the United States, although appurtenant to them, until there had been action by the political department of the Government incorporating them into the American family.

Upon the other question, whether, if they were a part of the Territories of the United States, they were entitled to the benign provisions of the Constitution, and particularly to that provision which requires uniformity in the laying of duties, taxes, and imposts, Judge White left nobody in doubt concerning the views of the members of the court for whom he spoke. He said:

To eliminate all controversies of this character, and thus to come to the pivotal contentions which the case involves, let me state and concede the soundness of some principles, referring in doing so in the margin to the authorities by which they are sustained, and making such comment on some of them as may to me appear necessary.

* * * * * * *

Sixth. As Congress in governing the Territories is subject to the Constitution, it results that all the limitations of the Constitution which are applicable to Congress in exercising this authority necessarily limit its power on this subject. It follows, also, that every provision of the Constitution which is applicable to the Territories is also controlling therein.

To justify a departure from this elementary principle by a criticism of the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Taney in Scott vs. Sanford (19 How., 393), appears to me to be unwarranted. Whatever may be the view entertained of the correctness of the opinion of the court in that case, in so far as it interpreted a particular provision of the Constitution concerning slavery and decided that as so construed it was in force in the Territories, this in no way affects the principle which that decision announced, that the applicable provisions of the Constitution were operative. That doctrine was concurred in by the dissenting judges, as the following excerpts demonstrate. Thus Mr. Justice McLean, in the course of his dissenting opinion, said (19 How., 542):

"In organizing the government of a Territory, Congress is limited to means appropriate to the attainment of the constitutional object. No powers can be exercised which are prohibited by the Constitution, or which are contrary to its spirit."

Mr. Justice Curtis, also in the dissent expressed by him, said (p. 614):

"If, then, this clause does contain a power to legislate respecting the Territory, what are the limits of that power?

"To this I answer that, in common with all the other legislative powers of Congress, it finds limits in the express prohibitions on Congress not to do certain things; that, in the exercise of the legislative power, Congress can not pass an ex post facto law or bill of attainder; and so in respect to each of the other prohibitions contained in the Constitution."

Seventh. In the case of the Territories, as in every other instance, when a provision of the Constitution is invoked, the question which arises is, not whether the Constitution is operative, for that is self-evident, but whether the provision relied on is applicable.

Eighth. As Congress derives its authority to levy local taxes for local purposes within the Territories, not from the general grant of power to tax as expressed in the Constitution, it follows that its right to locally tax is not to be measured by the provision empowering Congress "To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," and is not restrained by the requirement of uniformity throughout the United States. But the power just referred to, as well as the qualification of uniformity, restrains Congress from imposing an impost duty on goods coming into the United States from a Territory which has been incorporated into and forms a part of the United States. This results because the clause of the Constitution in question does not confer upon Congress power to impose such an impost duty on goods coming from one part of the United States to another part thereof, and such duty besides would be repugnant to the requirement of uniformity throughout the United States.

In the two last sentences Judge White states the precise case which we have before us, namely, that under the provision empowering Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises, Congress is restrained in the Territories, as much as anywhere else, by the requirement of uniformity, and that failure in a law to require such uniformity would render it repugnant to the Constitution. That idea is laid down by him a little further along in another statement which I shall read, and that will conclude my review of these opinions.

Says Judge White:

There can also be no contention as to the authority of Congress to levy such local taxes in Porto Rico as it may choose, even although the amount of the local burden so levied be manifold more onerous than is the duty with which this case is concerned. But as the duty in question was not a local tax, since it was levied in the United States on goods coming from Porto Rico, it follows that if that island was a part of the United States the duty was repugnant to the Constitution, since the authority to levy an impost duty conferred by the Constitution on Congress does not, as I have conceded, include the right to lay such a burden on goods coming from one to another part of the United States. And, besides, if Porto Rico was a part of the United States the exaction was repugnant to the uniformity clause.

The sole and only issue, then, is not whether Congress has taxed Porto Rico without representation—for, whether the tax was local or national, it could have been imposed, although Porto Rico had no representative local government and was not represented in Congress—but is, whether the particular tax in question was levied in such form as to cause it to be repugnant to the Constitution. This is to be resolved by answering the inquiry, Had Porto Rico, at the time of the passage of the act in question, been incorporated into and become an integral part of the United States?

I think the extracts from the opinions of the judges of the court, which I have read to the Senate, sustain fully the position taken by me at the outset, that a majority of the members of the court in the insular cases distinctly pronounced against the contention of the Republican party as to the power of this Government in dealing with our new possessions. Upon the first proposition, "Are the territories acquired from Spain as the result of the treaty of peace a part of the United States by virtue of that treaty?" the opinion of the court is 5 against 4 that they are. Upon the second proposition, conceding them to be Territories, "Do the clauses of the Constitution with reference to taxation, and particularly that one requiring uniformity in taxation, apply to them?" the opinion of the court is 8 to 1 that they do.

Suppose that case had come up to the Supreme Court upon a certificate of a division of opinion and that these two questions had been certified to the Supreme Court; first, did the Territory of Porto Rico become a part of the United States as much so as any other Territory upon the cession to us of that Territory by Spain, and, second, if it did become such, does the provision of the Constitution requiring uniformity in the laying of taxes, duties, and imposts apply there? The Supreme Court would have had to answer those questions thus certified up to it and leave it to the lower court to render the appropriate judgment. What would have been the answer? The answer would have been, "Yes, Porto Rico did become a part of the Territories of the United States; yes, the Constitution does apply there, requiring uniformity in the laying of taxes, duties, and imposts."

That would have left no room in the lower court to enter any other judgment than one that the taxes collected in that particular case were invalid and that the collector of the port must make restitution to the citizens who had paid those taxes. That would have been the logical judgment of the lower court in that form of proceeding, as much so as the judgment actually rendered by the Supreme Court in the case was the logical judgment upon the peculiar and different and diverging views which the opinions of the judges presented. A few moments ago I instanced the case of an ordinary action on a promissory note in which two out of the three judges had decided against the sufficiency of every defense put in by the defendant, and yet in which the judgment necessarily went in his favor.

I suppose our Republican friends, upon the theory on which they claim that the decisions of the Supreme Court in the insular cases has given them a free hand in dealing with the Territories, would claim in a jurisdiction where a judgment such as that had been rendered, that the liability of debtors to answer for their debts had been abolished, and that debtors had been given a free hand in the matter of the payment of their debts. I suppose they would hold that the effect of the judgment of the Supreme Court in that case was that the question of a sufficient consideration in contracts, and the question as to whether the statute of limitations had run so as to bar the commencement of actions, were no longer of any moment in that jurisdiction. It would be just as logical for them to do so as to now claim that this decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which pronounces against every contention they have ever made, gives them warrant to proceed in the unconstitutional course which they have marked out for themselves.

Mr. President, this bill flies in the face of the reasoning of the judges in the insular cases. It treats the actual decision reached there with contempt. It does not pay even a passing respect to the opinions of the judges. I remember, six years ago, when the air was filled with Republican denunciations of the Democratic party because it criticised the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the income-tax case. The Democratic party never made any proposition to override the decision of the Supreme Court in the income-tax case. It never conceived the idea of treating that decision with contemptuous defiance. Its proposition was to amend the Constitution so that a law might be passed under which an income tax could be constitutionally levied. Yet it was held up to the scorn and contempt of the people of this country as repudiating the solemn adjudication of the highest court of the land, and the people were told that no party was worthy their support which has disrespect for the decisions of the courts.

Here, however, this same party which held the Democratic party up to the scorn and reprobation of the people for merely criticising a decision of the Supreme Court is proposing to push this bill through under whip and spur, notwithstanding that it is plainly and directly in conflict with the Constitution and with the most recent decision of the Supreme Court on the subject; and to add deceit to infidelity, it is making the impudent claim that it is proceeding in accordance with and with all due respect for that decision.

Mr. President, I pass now to another branch of this discussion. Since the debate on this bill commenced I have again looked somewhat into the documents and reports furnished to us concerning the history of our dealings with the Philippine Islands and their unfortunate people. I say I have again looked somewhat into those documents and reports, although I had never before looked through them in their entirety, because they have come to us by piecemeal, as the result of our insistence and persistence, and then only as the political exigencies of the moment seemed to make it safe for the interests of the dominant political party to do so. The most important and instructive revelations have come to us since the last Presidential election, and not having had occasion to examine the subject since that event until the present time, I was ignorant of their purport and their import.

I am not certain that we have them all now. The policy of concealment and duplicity which has been practiced for the last three years in reference to our conduct in the Philippine Islands has been too well known to those of us here at the Capitol, and has been persisted in too shamelessly and brazenly, for us to hope that it has now been abandoned and that we at last have before us a full, true, and complete history of all that has transpired in that far-away country, and involving its unhappy and unfortunate people. But we have enough, and more than enough, in my judgment, to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every American who loves his country and would see it regulate its conduct, not on lines of false benevolence and philanthropy, but on high and strict principles of honor and justice and fair dealing.

I believe I love my country as much as any man. I have given evidence of it in an humble way during my lifetime. I am proud of its martial glories. I would advance its just interests in every way. My disposition is to be of it and with it and to defend it and protect it at all times and under all circumstances, but I declare that the history of our conduct in the Philippines, as presented to us in these authentic documents and reports has stirred me as I never before was stirred, and has made it seem to me a patriotic duty, in the name of the American people, who have been kept in ignorance too long, and in the interest of their honor, bedraggled and besmirched by their servants without their knowledge, to denounce that conduct with all the force and strength and vehemence which I possess; and further, to spread that history, so far as it can be done within the limits of ordinary debate and so far as the patience of the Senate will permit, upon our records for the information of the American people, who are no less just and honorable and God fearing than they are loyal and patriotic.

If those documents to which I refer could be placed in the hands of every American voter, we would not long be debating here in Washington the propriety of a tariff bill for a people 7,000 miles distant from us, who claim the right to do that for themselves, who are fighting and dying for that right, and who have never forfeited that right unless they did so when they took up arms in our quarrel and trusted us to deal honorably with them when that quarrel had ended. No, sir. Any political party that proposed such a thing would be left without a corporal's guard in either House of Congress. It would be relegated to the obscurity which it deserves, and would never emerge therefrom until a new generation had purged it of its corrupt and corrupting leadership and until it had come to know, by the discipline and ignominy of defeat, that the claims of justice can not be blotted out by a false and hypocritical philanthropy, and that national honor is of more importance to our children than all the trade that can be gathered up in a hundred years by the subjugation and the enslavement of a helpless and dependent but liberty-loving people.

I took the position, in a speech delivered in this Chamber two years ago, that in our dealings with the people of the Philippine Islands we had violated every obligation that ought to bind honorable men and that ought to bind nations, and that our conduct in that respect was without parallel in the history of the world, even at the hands of the most lawless, arbitrary, and tyrannical of governments. I not only took that position, but I sustained it by irrefragable testimony, and from that day to this, so far as I know, neither in nor out of Congress has any man attempted to impeach that testimony or to controvert the certain and shameful conclusion to which it inevitably leads.

True it is that there have been a great many Republican speeches in this Chamber, discussing generally, at more or less length, both before and since that time, the period covering our connection with the Philippine Islands. But those speeches have generally assumed rather than discussed the facts, and where they have pretended to discuss the facts they have discreetly avoided the evidence to which I referred at that time, and which I shall again bring up and amplify in the remarks I shall make to-day.

Indeed, those speeches have generally been in the nature of philippics filled with denunciation and invective, not only against the unfortunate Filipinos, but against every man in this country who would not join in a frenzied and bloodthirsty outcry against them, and have been intended by their authors more for the purpose of holding their political opponents up to the opprobrium of the country as disloyal and unpatriotic than for any other purpose. Such speeches add nothing to the truth of history, and are forgotten as soon as the political dog days that generated them have passed away.

A similar course was pursued toward Burke and Pitt and Fox in the English Parliament during our own Revolutionary war, with the result that the ears of the people of England were closed to the truth and that disastrous war continued by the English Government until exhaustion supervened. But denunciation and calumny and epithets, so far as they were intended to affect the conduct of those great men, fell on stony and unfruitful soil, and they continued through good report and evil report during the entire war to thunder against the tyranny of their own country against the American colonies.

Without any claim whatever to their eloquence or to the moral grandeur which animated and sustained them, I yet have in me sufficient of their spirit to love truth for the sake of truth, to cleave to national honor for the sake of my country, and to defend liberty everywhere for the sake of humanity, that humanity which we know springs from a single just God and which our sages and philosophers have taught us is entitled alike everywhere to pursue its happiness according to its own ideals and under institutions which it itself has framed and which it itself shall administer.

If it shall be charged that those of us here who speak our minds freely upon the Philippine situation are inciting to insurrection and rebellion, we can remember that we are in distinguished company and take heart accordingly. One hundred and thirty-seven years ago the English ministry were pushing through the House of Commons, at Westminster, an unconstitutional bill for the taxation of the American colonies as we to-day are pushing through the Senate an unconstitutional bill for the taxation of the people of the Philippine Islands. Mr. Grenville, one of the adherents of the ministry, took the opponents of the bill to task for the freedom with which they had spoken in debate, and he told them that they were inciting to sedition and insurrection in the American colonies. His language is so much like some I have heard in this Chamber lately that I wish to read it to the Senate. I read from Hazlitt's Debates, at page 13. Mr. Grenville said:

> The seditious spirit of the colonies owes its birth to factions in this house. Gentlemen are careless of the consequences of what they say, provided it answers the purposes of opposition.
> We were told we trod on tender ground; we were bid to expect disobedience. What was this but telling the Americans to stand out against the law, to encourage their obstinancy with expectation of support from hence? Let us only hold out a little, they would say, our friends will soon be in power.

The elder Pitt was then still a member of the House of Commons and was one of the most vehement and eloquent opponents of the unconstitutional measure, and he replied to Mr. Grenville's charge in these words:

> Gentlemen, sir, have been charged with giving birth to the sedition in America. They have spoken their sentiments with freedom against this unhappy act, and that freedom has become their crime. Sorry I am to hear the liberty of speech in this House imputed as a crime. But the imputation shall not discourage me. It is a liberty I mean to exercise.
> No gentleman ought to be afraid to exercise it. It is a liberty by which the gentleman who calumniates it might have profited, by which he ought to have profited. He ought to have desisted from his project. The gentleman tells us America is obstinate; America is almost in open rebellion. I rejoice that America has resisted. Three millions of people so dead to all feelings of liberty as voluntarily to submit to be slaves would have been fit instruments to make slaves of the rest.

Is liberty of speech in the American Senate to be less regarded to-day than it was in the English House of Commons one hundred and thirty-seven years ago? I care nothing for the criticism of military satraps; they know little and care less about constitutional liberty; but are not we to be permitted to speak our minds freely here upon the subject without being taken to task for it by Senators themselves? If so, I will not imitate the liberty permitted to himself by Mr. Pitt and say that I am glad the Filipinos resisted, but I will paraphrase his other statement and say that 10,000,000 men so dead to liberty as to permit themselves voluntarily to be made slaves would be fit instruments to make slaves of the rest of us; and I will go further and say that if the resistance of the Filipino people to our wicked and lawless action shall serve to awaken the conscience of the American nation to the base betrayal of liberty involved in this whole Philippine adventure, it will have been a happy and a fortunate incident for the American people and one which is worth all the blood and treasure that it has cost us, because it will prevent us from ever again in all our history entering upon such another adventure.

Mr. President, if it be true that the insurrection has been stamped out in the Philippine Islands—and I see no reason to believe that, but much reason to doubt it—it offers no new light to my mind. Material effects can not change moral principles. Our course in the Philippines is no less wicked and indefensible to-day than it was two years ago or in the beginning. Admit that the spirit of liberty in the Philippines has been subdued. Who is there in this country that ever had any doubt of the result of the war in the Philippines?

Eighty million Anglo-Saxons have been enabled to conquer 10,000,000 Orientals, effeminate by nature and effeminated by centuries of tyranny and misrule. But we may well remember in considering the course that we shall pursue toward that people, even at this late day, that those 10,000,000 Orientals came to our aid as one man in our war with Spain; that those 10,000,000 Orientals who helped us to fight our battles are the only men of the Asiatic continent or its outlying islands who in all history have aspired to liberty and independence and have had the courage and the hardihood to fight and to die for it; that those 10,000,000 Orientals who helped us fight our battles and are singular among all their kin in their aspirations for liberty we have decimated by fire and sword and famine and disease; have wasted and desolated their land, destroyed their homes, scattered their families, and sowed the bitterness of death in every heart and its haunting shadow in every mind.

Why have we done all that? Because we are a great, philanthropic nation, who owed those people so much that we could not trust them to the tender mercies of others, but must extend to them our powerful protection and elevate and uplift them by the influence of our humane Christian civilization. I have heard this answer given so many times, in almost the identical words I have employed and with little more of amplification, that its iteration has made me sick at heart and almost ashamed of my kind—sick at heart at the hypocrisy that could make such a statement, and ashamed of the credulity of those who could accept it and believe it.

There have been some conspicuous and honorable exceptions among those sustaining the policy of Philippine subjugation, men who have not been afraid to avow the end toward which their action tended; but I must, while complimenting those gentlemen for their candor, condemn their understanding and their principles. But I say it would be much better and it would be much more honorable if everybody who is standing shoulder to shoulder with them in carrying out that policy would be equally candid, because then the issue could be made up with definiteness and certainty for the action of the American people and presented to them without any fear of their misunderstanding it, as they did misunderstand it in the last Presidential election. I invite all our Republican friends, then, to come out into the open, to come out from behind their intrenchments, to quit their bushwhacking and their guerrilla warfare, to avow their sentiments and make their actions conform to them; and then if the American people are to follow in the footsteps of the robber nations of the Old World and make their profit by the conquest and subjugation of weaker nations, they will do it with their eyes open and not be pushed on, step by step, as they are now being pushed on, each step but serving to make retreat more difficult and each step serving as a specious excuse for another step in the wretched and lawless direction into which our footsteps have been turned.

Mr. President, if the Senate will indulge me, I will now produce some of the documentary evidence which points our moral duty to the people of the Philippine Islands, reading from the documents as I proceed to verify my assertions and later drawing the deductions which they seem to imperatively require.

It is well known to all that insurrection had existed in the Philippine Islands even before the breaking out of our own war with Spain. That insurrection was merely one of a great number that had been waged by the people of those islands against Spain because of her tyranny and misrule during the last three hundred years. This last one commenced in August, 1896, and was supposed to have been ended by the treaty of Biac-na-Bato on December 14, 1897, only five months before the breaking out of our own war with Spain.

But, as a matter of fact, the insurrection never was ended, because of the immediate bad faith of Spain in carrying out the provisions of that treaty inserted for the Filipinos as the consideration upon which the war was ended; and while the leaders of the insurrection, under the terms of that treaty, were deported from the islands to foreign countries, the insurrection, as a matter of fact, never was stamped out. It was going on with great force and vigor at the time of our declaration of war against Spain.

I will read briefly from the documents to establish this position. It will take some time to read all these documents, and I regret to detain the Senate, but I feel that a presentation of the true history of this whole matter to the American people is an imperative necessity, and since I see nobody else doing it I have assumed the duty myself, although conscious of my own defects and imperfections in the performance of such a task.

I say that the insurrection which had commenced in August, 1896, and which was supposed to have been ended by the treaty of December 14, 1897, was not ended by that treaty, and was, in fact, going on at the time we appealed to the leaders of the insurrection to come to our assistance in the war with Spain.

I first call the attention of the Senate to an article upon this subject, published in the Singapore Free Press on Wednesday, May 4, 1898. Singapore is in the neighborhood of the archipelago, and the people there are well informed concerning the happenings in that part of the world. This article was published in that paper on May 4, the very day that Admiral Dewey destroyed the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila, and only about a week after our declaration of war against Spain. It speaks concerning happenings which occurred before our declaration of war was made. The article says:

In December last General Primo de Rivera, who above all other Spanish generals has an intimate knowledge of the country and its inhabitants, found the position untenable for both parties—

That is, the position of the insurrectionists and of the Government—

Neither of these had the remotest chance of terminating the rebellion decisively, the rebels secure in their mountain fastnesses, the Spaniards holding the chief towns and villages on the coast. Primo de Rivera therefore sent two well-known Philippine natives, occupying high positions in Manila, to propose terms of peace to General Aguinaldo in Biac-na-Bato. A council of the revolutionary government was held, in which it was agreed to lay down arms on condition of certain reforms being introduced. The principal of these were:

1. The expulsion, or at least secularization, of the religious orders, and the inhibition of these orders from all official vetoes in civil administration.

2. A general amnesty for all rebels, and guarantees for their personal security and from the vengeance of the friars and parish priests after returning to their homes.

3. Radical reforms to curtail the glaring abuses in public administration.

4. Freedom of the press to denounce official corruption and blackmailing.

5. Representation in the Spanish Parliament.

6. Abolition of the iniquitous system of secret deportation of political suspects, etc.

Primo de Rivera agreed to these reforms in sum and substance, but made it a condition that the principal rebel leaders must leave the country during His Majesty's pleasure. As these had lost all their property or had had it confiscated and plundered, the Government agreed to provide them with funds to live in a becoming manner on foreign soil.

The rebels laid down their arms and peace was apparently secured, but no sooner had they done so and returned to their houses than the intransigent religious orders commenced at once to again persecute them and trump up imaginary charges to procure their rearrest. The Spanish Government, on its side, imagining itself secure, desisted from carrying out the promised reforms, thinking another trick like that played on the Cubans after the peace of Zanjon, arranged by Martinez Campos, might succeed. The Filipinos, however, with this business before them, refused to be made dupes of, and have taken up arms again, not alone in the immediate districts around Manila, but throughout the archipelago, which merely awaits the signal from General Aguinaldo to rise en masse, no doubt carrying with them the native troops hitherto loyal, and for which loyal service they have received no thanks but only ingratitude.

Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, accompanied by his aid-de-camp, Col. Marcelo H. del Pilar, and his private secretary, Mr. J. Leyba, arrived incognito in Singapore from Saigon on April 21, 1898. In Saigon, where Aguinaldo had remained for one week, he had interviews with one or two old Filipino friends now resident there. The special purpose of Aguinaldo's visit to Singapore was to consult other friends here, particularly Mr. Howard W. Bray, an old and intimate English friend, for fifteen years resident in the Philippines, about the state of affairs in the islands generally—particularly as to the possibility of war between the United States and Spain, and whether, in such an event, the United States would eventually recognize the independence of the Philippines, provided he lent his cooperation to the Americans in the conquest of the country. The situation of the moment was this, that the conditions of the honorable peace concluded on December 14, 1897, between President Aguinaldo, on behalf of the Philippine rebels, and H. E. Governor-General Primo de Rivera, on behalf of Spain, had not been carried out, although their immediate execution had been vouched for in that agreement.

These reforms would have provided protection to the people against the organized oppression and rapacity of the religious fraternities, would have secured improved civil and criminal procedure in courts, and have guaranteed, in many ways, improvements in the fiscal and social conditions of the people. The repudiation by the Spanish Government of these conditions, made by General Primo di Rivera, now left the rebel leaders, who had for the most part gone to Hongkong, free to act. And it was in pursuance of that freedom of action that Aguinaldo again sought counsel of his friends in Saigon and Singapore, with a view to the immediate resumption of operations in the Philippines.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me to inquire from what book he reads?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir. I find this article published in Senate Document No. 62, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, page 344.

Mr. BACON. That document, I understand, was sent by the Executive Department to Congress.

Mr. TURNER. It is a document which was sent here by the President of the United States. The contents of that document were in the possession of the Executive Department, as well as all of the others from which I shall read, and were likewise in the possession of our peace commissioners at the time the treaty of peace was negotiated in the city of Paris.

I next call the attention of the Senate to a report made by Gen. F. V. Greene for the information of the President and of the peace commissioners, and to the addenda accompanying that report, being a statement of present and past conditions in the island by Agoncillo, who accompanied General Greene to this country, and I will read briefly from General Greene's report and from Agoncillo's statement. I read from page 421 of this Document No. 62:

Insurgent civil administration.—In August, 1896, an insurrection broke out in Cavite under the leadership of Emilio Aguinaldo, and soon spread to other provinces on both sides of Manila. It continued with varying successes on both sides, and the trial and execution of numerous insurgents, until December, 1897, when the Governor-General, Primo de Rivera, entered into written agreement with Aguinaldo, the substance of the document, which is in possession of Señor Felipe Agoncillo, who accompanies me to Washington, being attached hereto and marked A. In brief, it required that Aguinaldo and the other insurgent leaders should leave the country, the Government agreeing to pay them $800,000 in silver and promising to introduce numerous reforms, including representation in the Spanish Cortes, freedom of the press, general amnesty for all insurgents, and the expulsion or secularization of the monastic orders.

Aguinaldo and his associates went to Hongkong and Singapore. A portion of the money, $400,000, was deposited in banks in Hongkong, and a lawsuit soon arose between Aguinaldo and one of his subordinate chiefs named Artacho, which is interesting on account of the very honorable position taken by Aguinaldo. Artacho sued for a division of the money among the insurgents according to rank. Aguinaldo claimed that the money was a trust fund, and was to remain on deposit until it was seen whether the Spaniards would carry out their promised reforms, and if they failed to do so it was to be used to defray the expenses of a new insurrection. The suit was settled out of court by paying Artacho $5,000.

No steps have been taken to introduce the reforms, more than 2,000 insurgents, who had been deported to Fernando Po and other places, are still in confinement, and Aguinaldo is now using the money to carry on the operations of the present insurrection.

I next read from Agoncillo's statement, at pages 429, 430, and 431. This statement, be it remembered, was made at the request of our officers and presented by them as a verity.

BRIEF NOTES BY SEÑOR AGONCILLO.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1898.

On the same day that Admiral Dewey arrived at Hongkong Señor Aguinaldo was in Singapore, whither he had gone from Hongkong, and Mr. Pratt, United States consul-general, under instructions from the said Admiral, held a conference with him, in which it was agreed that Señor Aguinaldo and other revolutionary chiefs, in cooperation with the American squadron, should return to take up arms against the Spanish government of the Philippines, the sole and most laudable desire of the Washington Government being to concede to the Philippine people absolute independence as soon as the victory against the Spanish arms should be obtained. By virtue of this agreement Señor Aguinaldo proceeded by the first steamer to Hongkong for the express purpose of embarking on the Olympia and going to Manila; but this intention of his was not realized, because the American squadron left Hongkong the day previous to his arrival, Admiral Dewey having received from his Government an order to proceed immediately to Manila. That is what

Mr. Wildman, United States consul-general in Hongkong, said to Señor Aguinaldo in the interview which took place between them.

A few days after the Spanish squadron had been totally destroyed in the bay of Manila by the American squadron, the latter obtaining a most glorious triumph, which deserved the fullest congratulations and praise of the Philippine public, the McCuKoch arrived at Hongkong, and her commander said to Señor Aguinaldo that Admiral Dewey needed him (le necesitaba) in Manila and that he brought an order to take him on board said transport, as well as other revolutionary chiefs, whose number should be determined by Señor Aguinaldo; and in fact he and seventeen chiefs went to Cavite on the McCulloch.

Señor Aguinaldo began his campaign against the Spaniards the very day he received the 1,902 Mauser guns and 200,000 cartridges which came from Hongkong.

The first victory which he obtained from the Spaniards was the surrender or capitulation of the Spanish general Señor Peña, who was the military governor of Cavite, had his headquarters in the town of San Francisco de Malabon, and his force was composed of 1,500 soldiers, including volunteers.

The revolutionary army, in six days' operations, succeeded in getting possession of the Spanish detachments stationed in the villages of Bacoor, Imus, Benakayan, Noveleta, Santa Cruz de Malabon, Rosario, and Cavite Viejo.

On the 9th of June last the whole province of Cavite was under the control of the provisional revolutionary government, including many Spanish prisoners and friars, 7,000 guns, great quantities of ammunition, and some cannon.

At the same time that the province of Cavite was being conquered other revolutionary chiefs were carrying on campaigns in the Batangas, Laguna, Tayabas, Nueva Ecija, Bulacan, Batangas, Pampanga, and Morong, which were under control of the revolutionary army by the 12th of June; and such progress was made by the Philippine revolution in the few days of campaign against the Spaniards that by the 3d of August last it held under conquest fifteen important provinces of the island of Luzon. These provinces are being governed by laws emanating from the provisional revolutionary government, and in all of them perfect order and complete tranquillity reign.

It is to be noted that the Spanish Government has sent to Señor Aguinaldo various emissaries who invited him to make common cause with Spain against the United States, promising him that the Government of the Spanish nation would concede to him anything he might ask for the Philippine people; but Señor Aguinaldo has invariably replied to those emissaries that it was too late, and that he could not consider any proposition from the Spanish Government, however beneficial it might be to the Philippines, because he had already pledged his word and honor in favor of certain representatives of the Government at Washington.

In view of this positive resolution of Señor Aguinaldo there began forthwith the intrigues of the Spanish enemy directed against the life of Señor Aguinaldo.

Señor Aguinaldo and the other revolutionists who reside in Hongkong agreed not to take out one cent of the $400,000 deposited in the Chartered Bank and the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, the only amount which Señor Aguinaldo received from the Spanish Government on account of the stipulated indemnity, but to use it for arms in order to carry on another revolution in the Philippines in case the Spanish Government should fail to carry out the peace agreement, at least in so far as it refers to general amnesty and reforms. All the above-named revolutionists, Señor Aguinaldo setting the example, resolved to deny themselves every kind of comfort during their stay in Hongkong, living in the most modest style, for the purpose of preventing a reduction by one single cent of the above-named sum of $400,000 which they set aside exclusively for the benefit of their country.

I next read from this same document, commencing at page 319, letters written by Mr. Williams, our consul at Manila, to the Department of State and on file in that Department. On the 22d day of February, 1898, three months before our declaration of war against Spain, Mr. Williams wrote:

Peace was proclaimed, and since my coming festivities therefor were held; but there is no peace, and has been none for about two years. Conditions here and in Cuba are practically alike. War exists, battles are of almost daily occurrence, ambulances bring in many wounded, and hospitals are full. Prisoners are brought here and shot without trial, and Manila is under martial law.

The Crown forces have not been able to dislodge a rebel army within 10 miles of Manila, and last Saturday, February 19, a battle was there fought and 5 dead left on the field. Much of such information is found in my longer dispatch, referred to, and which is at your command.

The governor-general, who is amiable and popular, having resigned, wishes credit for pacification, and certain rebel leaders were given a cash bribe of $1,650,000 to consent to public deportation to China. This bribe and deportation only multiplied claimants and fanned the fires of discontent.

Insurgents demand fewer exactions from church and state, a half of public offices, and fewer church holidays, which seriously retard business.

A republic is organized here, as in Cuba. Insurgents are being armed and drilled; are rapidly increasing in numbers and efficiency, and all agree that a general uprising will come as soon as the governor-general embarks for Spain, which is fixed for March.

On March 19, 1898, in another letter to the Department, this consul makes these statements:

Insurrection is rampant; many killed, wounded, and made prisoners on both sides. A battle ship, the Don Juan de Austria, sent this week to the northern part of Luzon to cooperate with a land force of 2,000 dispatched to succor local forces, overwhelmed by rebels.

* * * * * * *

Rebellion never more threatening to Spain. Rebels getting arms, money, and friends, and they outnumber the Spaniards, resident and soldiery, probably a hundred to one.

In another dispatch to the Secretary of State, dated March 27, 1898, Mr. Williams said:

Cuban conditions exist here possibly in aggravated form. Spanish soldiers are killed and wounded daily, despite claimed pacification, and the hospitals are kept full.

The majority of casualties are reported from the ranks of the native insurgents, and the cruelties and horrors of war are daily repeated.

Cavite is the naval port of Luzon, situated about 8 miles across the bay from Manila, and about 20 miles distant by way of bay shore and public highway, and last Thursday, March 24, a Crown regiment of natives, the Seventy-fourth, stationed there was ordered to advance against native insurgents near by. The regiment refused to obey orders, and 8 corporals were called out and shot to death in presence of the regiment, which was again ordered to advance and threat made that a refusal would be death to all. All did refuse and were sent to barracks to await sentence. On the morning of the following Friday, March 25, the entire regiment, with arms and equipment, marched out of the barracks and deserted in a body to the insurgents, saying they were willing to fight the foreign enemies of Spain, but would not fight their friends.

Since beginning this dispatch I learn of the desertion to the insurgents of another entire regiment. These are said to be the severest set-backs received by Spain during the two years' insurrection here.

On Friday morning, March 25, a church holiday, a meeting of natives was being held near my consulate in Manila, the natives being unarmed. The building was surrounded by police and military, the meeting broken up, 12 natives wantonly shot to death, several wounded, and 62 taken prisoners. Saturday morning, March 26, the 62 prisoners were marched in a body to the cemetery and shot to death, although it was shown that several were chance passers-by or employees in ships adjoining, not being in attendance at the meeting.

It was cold comfort to the widows and orphans of innocent men to have Spanish officers present them the mangled corpses of husbands and fathers.

Such horrors, but usually on a smaller scale, but at times attended by greater disregard for modern rules of war, occur almost daily, and the piteous cry goes up, "Will it ever stop?"

The Crown forces are now building a cordon of small forts on city's outskirts for defense against provincial natives, who are expected to soon attack Manila. In fact, two detectives and one messenger have come to me this evening with information that attack was to be made to-night, and everybody is anxious, as 8,000 native insurgent soldiers are encamped only 5 miles away.

The insurgents seem to lack arms and organization, but, so far as I can learn, outnumber the Spanish forces and inhabitants twenty to one. Arms are being obtained and organization slowly effected, and all classes fear the near future. It is said that the only reason why Manila has not been taken and burned is because a vast majority of its population is in perfect accord with the insurgents.

In view of these statements of our consul, in view of the activity of the leaders of the insurrection in foreign countries months before our war against Spain, in view of their attempt some months before that event to enter into negotiations with the United States for arms to carry on their insurrection, as shown somewhere, although I have not the paper before me, it is idle and vain to claim, as has been claimed in this body, that there was not a fully and completely developed revolution against the power of Spain going on in that country before we appeared on the scene with either our military or naval forces, or to claim that that revolution, which had been going on from August, 1896, was closed by the treaty of December 14, 1897. That treaty was simply an incident in the revolution, an incident which had occasioned the deportation of certain of the leaders of the revolution; but those who were left behind, finding that the Spanish Government did not propose to carry out the terms of that treaty, continued the revolution, and it was rampant at the time of our declaration of war with Spain.

It is equally vain for anybody to undertake to deny that the aspiration of the revolutionists was for independence and that we knew it. It has been said that independence was an afterthought on the part of certain ambitious Filipino leaders, but from the beginning to the end, for months before our war, during the entire war, and ever since, the object of the Filipino people has been independence, and nothing else, and everybody who had anything to do with that war on our part knew it to be so. They must have known it. I have collected from the documents which have been furnished to us here a great many evidences of that fact, which neither my own voice nor the patience of the Senate will permit me to read, but which I desire shall appear along with such comments as I shall make thereon. I ask leave of the Senate to insert from those documents without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TURNER. The printed matter hereafter referred to and not read in full will be found as an addenda at the close of my remarks.

I will here insert a dispatch from Consul Pratt to the Secretary of State setting forth the circumstances under which he came to have his interview with Aguinaldo at Singapore, setting forth that he sought the interview and that Aguinaldo did not, and furthermore, that Aguinaldo informed him distinctly and explicitly that his purpose in proceeding with the insurrection in the Philippines was the independence of the people of those islands.

The dispatch was accompanied by certain newspaper publications which had appeared in the press of Singapore, and in which was set forth more fully than in the dispatch what had transpired between Aguinaldo and Mr. Pratt, and in which was set forth what had transpired between Mr. Pratt and other Filipino patriots in the city of Singapore at a public meeting held at a later period, the dispatch and these publications showing that in all communications, public or private, had with Mr. Pratt he was made aware that the purpose of the Filipino leaders was to secure the ultimate independence of their country from the power of Spain and from that of every other country on the face of the globe. These papers are to be found in Senate Document No. 62, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, at pages 341, 342, 343, 345, 350, 351, and 352.

The next document that I shall insert is the proclamation of the Filipino junta at Hongkong prior to the departure of Dewey's fleet to Manila Bay, and I call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that that document sets out that the Americans having come to aid the Filipinos, as they had come to the aid of the Cubans, had brought independence within their reach, and for that reason it was urged upon the Filipino people to resist the overtures of Spain and to cleave to the cause of the United States in the war which was then about to be prosecuted by the United States in those islands.

The letter from Mr. Pratt transmitting this proclamation, and the proclamation itself, is found in Senate Document No. 62, at pages 345 and 346.

I shall next insert in this connection from Senate Document No. 208, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, page 88 to page 100, inclusive, a series of proclamations or decrees issued by the leaders of the Filipino insurrection after the return of Aguinaldo to the islands.

Each and every one of these proclamations—and all of them were issued before the fall of Manila—notified our leaders and officers, both there and here, that the Filipinos were there assisting us in prosecuting the war with Spain for the purpose of securing their independence, and for no other purpose. We paid them nothing and promised them nothing further than our action implied an honorable obligation to respect their well-known aspirations. It is wholly inadmissible to claim that they were fighting merely for a change of masters.

The next point I wish to establish is that our authorities did not disabuse the minds of the Filipino people of the impressions under which they were laboring that we were willing that they should have their independence; that, on the contrary, in view of our knowledge of their aspirations, it must be said that we encouraged them in that impression. This is partially shown, I think, by what transpired between Aguinaldo and Mr. Pratt and between Pratt and other Filipino patriots already referred to. It is further shown by a letter of Consul-General Wildman to Aguinaldo, found in Senate Document No. 62, pages 339–340, in which that official urged Aguinaldo to continue to cleave to the United States and to remember its declaration made at the commencement of the war, that its purpose was not territorial aggrandizement, and advising him that the Filipino people might trust to its sense of honor and justice after the war had been concluded.

I shall next insert a number of letters from General Anderson to Aguinaldo, all of them written before the fall of Manila, and found in Document No. 62, at pages 390 to 394. In these letters it will be noticed General Anderson speaks of our friendly disposition toward the Filipino people, says our forces were there to fight in their cause, makes requisition on him for supplies, asks his cooperation and support in a number of ways, all of which is consistent with a belief that we were in truth there to fight their cause, and inconsistent on the basis of honor and good faith with any other purpose.

I will also insert General Merritt's instructions to General Anderson, found in Senate Document No. 208, at page 14, which show that as late as August 10, three days before the surrender of Manila, it was deemed imperative that we continue on good terms with the insurgents, and give no inkling of our hostile purpose toward them. This explains our complaisance before the surrender of the city and our abrupt change of front after that event.

The only thing I find in all these records that indicates reservation on our part concerning Filipino independence after the conclusion of our war with Spain are the letters of the Secretary of State to Consul Pratt and Consul Wildman, disavowing the implied assurances given by them to Aguinaldo on that subject; but those officials were not instructed to communicate that disavowal to the Filipinos or to their leaders, nor was any other person ever instructed to do so, nor did any person ever inform them that their aspirations were looked on unfavorably by the American Government, although our officials were brought into intimate connection with them every day throughout the siege of Manila.

I ask that the documents to which I have referred may be printed as a part of my remarks without being read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TURNER. My next proposition is that, knowing of these aspirations of the Filipino people, taking no pains to communicate to them any inimical purpose of ours; knowing, moreover, that our agents had led them to believe, impliedly at least, that we were favorable to their aspirations, we accepted their assistance and that it was of great value to us in the war with Spain.

I refer to letters of Consul Williams to the Secretary of State, showing the character and extent of the services performed by the revolutionary forces after the arrival of Aguinaldo at Cavite and before the arrival of our own forces in the archipelago. Those letters are found in Senate Document No. 62, at pages 327, 328, and 329.

Next, the letter of Consul-General Wildman to the Secretary of State, found in Senate Document No. 62, at pages 337 and 338.

Next, the report of Major—now General—Bell, prepared by him for the information of our Peace Commissioners at Paris, found in Senate Document No. 62, at page 379.

Also a note by Major Bell, concerning what the insurgents had done before the capture of Manila, found in Senate Document No. 208, at page 27.

Also a report prepared by Gen. F. V. Greene for the use of our Commissioners at Paris in the negotiation of the treaty of peace with Spain, found in Senate Document No. 62, at pages 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, and 424.

Also the testimony of Gen. Chas. A. Whittier before our Peace Commission in Paris, found in Senate Document No. 62, at pages 499, 500, and 501.

I ask that the portions of those documents which I have indicated may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks without reading them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. TURNER. I next ask attention to evidence showing that, notwithstanding our great obligations to the Filipinos, we cut them out, partly by finesse and partly by force of any part in the surrender of the city of Manila, and then and thereby sowed the seeds of all the trouble which has since arisen between those people and ourselves. General Merritt, who arrived only a few days before the surrender, avoided any communication with Aguinaldo. I find this statement contained in General Greene's report to the Paris Commissioners in Senate Document No. 62, page 423.

The newspaper accounts of the surrender of the city of Manila, which I have not here, but which the Senate and country will remember, show that the attack upon the city of Manila was an opera bouffe affair, arranged between General Merritt and the commander of the Spanish forces there, simply for the purpose of saving the peculiar sense of honor of the Spanish general.

These newspaper accounts are verified by the testimony of General Whittier before our Commission at Paris, and is found in Senate Document No. 62, page 491.

General Merritt, before the surrender of the city of Manila, proceeded by finesse to get possession of the lines held by the insurgents, in order that they might not have the opportunity of participating in the capture of that city. In support of this statement I refer to the testimony of General Merritt himself given before the Commissioners at Paris and contained in Senate Document No. 62, at page 367.

For the purpose of showing how this was done I refer to a letter written by General Anderson to Aguinaldo on the 10th day of August, 1898, only two days before the surrender of the city, in which he sought and by means of which he obtained from the general of the insurgent forces possession of a particular position then held by his forces. This letter is found in Senate Document No. 208, to which I have before referred, at page 17.

Further, and in the same connection, I find in Document No. 208, at page 17, a significant telegram from Aguinaldo to General Anderson, dated August 13, the day of the surrender, at 10.30 a. m., in which he complained that his soldiers were being forced out of their positions by the American soldiers and prevented from participating in the assault upon the city of Manila, which shows that he had no knowledge prior to that time of the arrangement under which, after a feigned assault, the surrender was to be made to us.

I find in this same document, No. 208, at page 18, the memorandum of telegrams sent by General Merritt and General Anderson to Aguinaldo in answer to his telegram of the 13th, showing very plainly that they had arranged to bring about the surrender of the city without his knowledge, and without giving him or the insurgent forces under him any opportunity to participate therein.

I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD and printed as a part of my remarks the documents to which I refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, I will not further weary the Senate at this point with the presentation of documentary evidence, although the temptation is very great to do so, the documents and reports from which I have culled the evidence presented being very full and complete upon the moral aspect of our conduct in the Philippines. I should like to have inserted those documents in full, and would still do so but for the fact that it would make my remarks of interminable length.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TURNER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I am informed that the Senator from Washington would prefer to finish his remarks on another day. I hope that will be agreeable to the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire to press the Senator from Washington unduly or to go on at this time, but many Senators have been to me asking about adjourning over to-morrow. I should be personally extremely glad to do so. I have had a very fatiguing week, and I should like very much to adjourn over to-morrow. But we have been three weeks on this bill. The debate seems to be trailing along without any prospect of drawing to an end, and under those circumstances I do not feel that I am at liberty to assent to an adjournment over to-morrow. I dislike extremely to enter upon long sessions and to sit here on Saturday, when we know Senators have other work they desire to do. But, situated as I am, with this bill in my hands, which must pass, which is going to pass, and which is standing in the way of other business in which many Senators are interested, like the irrigation bill, which is next in order, I do not feel that I am justified, without some assurance as to closing the debate, in relaxing in regard to the sessions of the Senate. Otherwise I should——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator from Massachusetts will admit that there has been no unnecessary delay in the debate on this bill. If there have been debated some side issues, the debate was not started on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. LODGE. One of them was.

Mr. TELLER. Which one?

Mr. LODGE. The one about Judge Noyes.

Mr. TELLER. If it was, the debate was proceeded with on the other side.

Mr. LODGE. It went on on both sides in each case. One was begun on one side and one on the other.

Mr. TELLER. The revolutionary debate started on the other side, surely.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. And practically the other one was conducted on the other side yesterday. I should have liked myself to have said something about the question of Judge Noyes, but I felt I ought not to do so under the circumstances, and I refrained. I know another Senator who felt the same way, and he refrained. We refrained from doing it. The Senator from Massachusetts was allowed yesterday to take up his bill and practically complete all the committee amendments. There is only one pending that I know of, and that is the one I myself have offered.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Alabama has one, and then there is the amendment of the minority.

Mr. TELLER. I meant aside from that.

Mr. LODGE. I appreciate that I was allowed to complete the amendments to the bill.

Mr. TELLER. The urgent deficiency bill occupied some time.

Mr. LODGE. The urgent deficiency bill, plus Judge Noyes, occupied some time.

Mr. BACON. It was not taken out of the time of this bill.

Mr. LODGE. Not actually.

Mr. BACON. It was taken out of the time of the deficiency bill.

Mr. TELLER. And I suppose nobody will say that the debate was unusual or unexpected.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no. I find no fault with the debate; but I am anxious, naturally, to get along with the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say another thing to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator from Colorado will allow me, I should like to say something in this connection. In the beginning of this debate, when the bill first came in, the report of the Commission had not been printed. Senators had not had an opportunity to investigate it, and they had not had an opportunity to see what had been reported. It was absolutely necessary that there should be some delay until Senators could have an opportunity to familiarize themselves with that report.

Mr. TELLER. This bill is a departure from anything we have ever had in American legislation, and it involves the entire question of the present condition. Our whole foreign policy is to be determined by this bill.

If it becomes a law it will change the entire history of the American Government. It will be a complete parting of the ways and entering upon a new and untried system. Our relations to foreign governments will be entirely different from what they have ever been; and I say that a month, two months, is not an unfair time to debate this bill. If the Senators on the other side are not willing to debate it, we on this side are.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator's idea is that we are to take five weeks more——

Mr. TELLER. I do not say we are to take five weeks more, but I do say we ought not to be driven into a debate on this bill as if there was any necessity for haste.

Mr. LODGE. Now, the Senator knows very well that I have not driven this bill or driven debate, but I have tried to be as accommodating as possible in regard to it; and I am no more anxious to sit here Saturdays and to sit here late every day and begin early than anyone else.

Mr. TELLER. I am not charging that.

Mr. LODGE. I am quite as averse to it. But being responsible for the bill and the business of the Senate, to the extent that I am in charge of this bill, I do not feel justified in allowing days to go by without a session unless I have some reasonable assurance that we can close the debate on the bill within a reasonable time.

Mr. TELLER. I came here yesterday expecting to make a speech on this bill. I could have made it by declining to allow the Senator from Massachusetts to complete the amendments to the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. By the time his amendments were completed another question intervened, and of course I had no opportunity. The Senator from Washington had indicated his desire to go on to-day.

Now, Mr. President, Saturday is a day when you do not have anybody in the Senate very much. I do not want to disturb the Senate now by suggesting anything, but most of the time during the day there has not been a quorum in the Senate, and a good deal of the time not more than half, and it seems to me we ought not to be asked to come here to-morrow and debate this bill. The Senator from Washington has taken from a quarter to 2, when he began, I believe, until now, and it is practically half past 4. I think everybody will agree that he has not debated the bill with any unnecessary prolixity.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to say that there has not been any disposition on this side to delay unnecessarily the final vote on this bill, although that was charged against us before we had barely had an opportunity to commence to debate it. I should like very much, before I speak, if I do, to have the evidence of the chairman of this Commission. I will not get it if I speak to-morrow or Monday, I suppose. I do not think it is unreasonable for us to say that we think there ought to be an adjournment until Monday.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I am quite sure the Senator from Massachusetts is not intimating that there has been unnecessary delay, because he will bear me out in the statement that every member of the minority of the committee at any rate has assured him that there is not the slightest disposition to delay the passage of the bill. We are thoroughly earnest in that statement, and I believe he knows we are.

I imagine I do not violate any confidence in saying that fundamental principles are involved in this bill, and Senators on this side are quite anxious to debate it fully and thoroughly. There is now a bill before our committee, and the testimony which Judge Taft is giving relates quite largely to that bill, as well as to the bill now before the Senate. If the Senate, as the Senator from Massachusetts says with positiveness, is going to pass this bill, contrary to the Constitution, as we think, and involving a departure on our part from fundamental principles, I imagine there will not be a great deal of debate on the civil bill, which is to follow. I am not speaking for anybody except, perhaps, as I speak after consultation with the members of the minority; but if you establish the fact that you are going to tax these people anyway and are going to hold the islands and hold them as colonies, the civil bill ought to be the very best measure we can get up, giving to them as much liberty as possible. I imagine the debate on the civil bill, so far as this side is concerned, will be a question of details.

I know the Senator from Massachusetts is not charging that we are unnecessarily delaying, but it seems to me there ought not to be anything looking like undue haste in passing this bill, which, as we think, involves fundamental principles.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think I have been guilty of anything that can look like undue haste. The bill has been up for three weeks. It has been put over occasionally from day to day to accommodate Senators on the other side who were not ready to go on, and there is, as the Senator from Idaho says, another bill coming—the government bill—containing a great many important provisions in regard to which the Senator from Idaho and other members of the minority have told me it was not their intention to make a general debate, but to discuss it in detail. It is a bill containing provisions, in my judgment, far more important than this one, a bill which must be passed. If the whole Philippine debate is to be confined to this bill, of course that is another thing. I did not suppose such a thing was possible.

But, Mr. President, I merely want Senators on the other side to give me some reasonable assurance, in justice to other measures, that the bill will not be delayed, and that Senators on the other side who desire to speak will speak as rapidly as possible. I do not want to incommode the Senate by long hours and early sessions or sessions on Saturday. I much prefer to avoid that, but I feel compelled to ask for some assurances in regard to the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is no doubt in my mind that the passage of the bill will be facilitated by not pressing it unduly. The Senator from Massachusetts has not pressed the bill unduly up to this time. He has been entirely reasonable, and we on this side of the Senate Chamber have stated to him that we believed it would facilitate the transaction of business to have more time given and to allow Senators to be prepared to say what they wanted to say, and I believe now that an adjournment over to-morrow will shorten instead of prolong the debate.

Mr. LODGE. In view of what has been said by the Senator from Arkansas—his statement I take just as he makes it, and I am always ready to be guided by him in such matters—I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator from Washington does not desire to continue further to-night.

Mr. TURNER. That is true.

UNITED STATES MARSHALS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to put on their passage two very brief bills which will give rise to no debate whatever on the floor. The first is the bill (S. 2769) to fix the fees of United States marshals in Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD a brief letter from the Attorney-General which accompanied the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1902.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate.

SIR: Inclosed herewith is a draft of a proposed bill "To fix the fees of United States marshals in the Indian Territory, for certain services performed by them and their deputies; to fix the fees of witnesses in felony cases before United States commissioners, and in civil and criminal cases before the district courts in said Territory, and for other purposes."

The legislation indicated by said draft is believed to be very necessary because the compensation now allowable under the decision mentioned in said draft for services rendered in the Indian Territory by field deputies in felony cases, under the laws of Arkansas, as made applicable to the Indian Territory, is entirely inadequate, and the fees of witnesses in felony cases before United States commissioners are also much less than they should be. The following is an extract from a report made by an examiner of this Department under date of November 12, 1901:

"It is urgently necessary that Congress should extend the provisions of section 829, Revised Statutes, so that the deputies in this district as well as in the central and northern districts shall receive Federal fees in all cases.

"This is equally true as to section 848, governing the compensation of witnesses.

"I submit herewith Exhibit B, prepared by one of the field deputies, showing an actual case where he had just made an arrest of John Litsell, charged with larcency.

"The deputy traveled 15 miles to make the arrest and back, and the same distance on a later day to serve subpœnas. Under the Federal fee bill he would receive three-fourths of the $9.90 fees, or $7.42, and be reimbursed to the extent of $4.75 for expenses. His entire actual expenses having been $6.75, he would have lost $2 of his expenses, which would leave him a net earning of $5.42.

"Working under the Arkansas statutes in accordance with the Comptroller's decision, the deputy received 75 cents altogether for performing two days' services in this larceny case.

"Is it any wonder the field deputies have neglected and been unable to serve warrants in larceny cases; that the crimes of this character being committed are rapidly increasing, and that cattle and horses are being stolen almost in droves until a reign of lawlessness is rapidly approaching?

"One example only of the hardship worked upon witnesses by compensating them for attendance under Mansfield's Digest is cited. This came under my personal observation.

"A woman came into the marshal's office to draw her pay for witness attendance at a preliminary hearing before the commissioner at Ryan. She had traveled across the country with her team something like 30 miles to get to court, spent two or three days making the trip, at an expense of about $10 as she stated, and received as witness fees the sum of 50 cents. She would be obliged to repeat this same experience to attend the grand jury hearing, and, if the defendant was indicted, endure the same hardship a third time in attending court."

I also inclose a report of a grand jury sitting at Chickasha, Ind. T.

The fact that the compensation and fees above mentioned are so inadequate makes it difficult to enforce the law against persons guilty of felonies under the laws of Arkansas as made applicable to the Indian Territory, especially against those guilty of the crime of horse stealing.

It is therefore earnestly recommended that Congress enact legislation substantially in accordance with said draft.

Respectfully, P. C. KNOX, Attorney-General.

LIMITATION OF CONSPIRACY.

Mr. HOAR. I now ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 2952) to regulate the practice in the United States courts as to appeals and writs of error.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he would not be willing to ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 1118) to limit the meaning of the word "conspiracy" and the use of "restraining orders and injunctions" in certain cases, a bill also reported by his committee, and it seems to me an important one and one in which a good deal of interest is felt.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to do so, but the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is very much opposed to the bill as at present advised. I think when he has read it he may perhaps be less so; at any rate when he understands its purport. But I should hardly want to take it up in his absence. It would hardly be fair.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is an important measure, and it ought to be taken up and considered by the Senate. It has been reported by the Senator's committee, and the Senator from Connecticut is on the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I am very thoroughly and zealously for the bill. I have present the facts about it and an important decision. I should feel it my duty to this body to address the Senate in favor of this bill for twenty or thirty minutes at least. It is a bill copied from the English law of 1874 on that subject, and it carries out exactly what Chief Justice Shaw, of Massachusetts, as conservative a jurist as ever lived, as careful of all property rights and of law and order as anyone who ever lived, declared to be the common law of Massachusetts. But it has been represented as——

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, may I ask what is the business before the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. I am, by unanimous consent, making a brief statement why I do not move to take up the bill which the Senator from Arkansas has asked me to call up.

Mr. KEAN. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts asked leave to call up another bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will have permission to make his statement in reply to mine. Otherwise there certainly will be nothing else taken up by unanimous consent this afternoon.

Mr. HOAR. I asked leave to call up another bill, and the Senator from Arkansas asked me why I would not call up the conspiracy bill. I replied that, in the first place, it would not be just to the Senator from Connecticut, who is opposed to it, to take it up in his absence; and I was going on to add that it would be my duty to speak to the Senate for twenty or thirty minutes in favor of the bill if I did so, and then I should be obliged to read a long decision of the chief justice of the State of Massachusetts, who declared that this bill is the common law of Massachusetts. That is all. If the Senator objects, I will stop there.

Mr. KEAN. I never object to what the Senator from Massachusetts desires, but I thought he wanted to have the bill passed.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator from Arkansas would not put me in the attitude of undertaking to discuss the bill in a thin Senate. The Senator from Connecticut is just off a sick bed and is not able to be here all the time. It would be very unfair to compel him to come in or take up the bill when he is not here. I will ask for the consideration of the bill when the Senator from Connecticut is here. The Senator need not be afraid.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I regret the absence of the Senator from Connecticut, but I am glad to know that the Senator from Massachusetts will seek an early opportunity to present the bill to the Senate, when I hope it will be passed.

APPEALS AND WRITS OF ERROR.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2952) to regulate the practice in the United States courts as to appeals and writs of error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. TELLER. It is absolutely certain that that bill, as near as I can understand it, can not be passed at this time of the day.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Colorado perhaps has not observed that the Judiciary Committee report to strike out the second section.

Mr. TELLER. It is a question that I feel a little interest in, touching the getting into courts and the getting out. I see some difficulties in the bill. I should like to have a chance to look at it before it is taken up.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; I will not press it.

Mr. TELLER. There are other Senators here who feel the same way about it, I know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes back to the Calendar.

ARREARAGES OF TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up two bills in connection with taxes in the District of Columbia. It will take but a few moments. They are House bills and have passed the House.

I ask the Senate first to consider the bill (H. R. 10076) to receive arrearages of taxes due the District of Columbia to July 1, 1900, at 6 per cent per annum, in lieu of penalties and costs.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, on page 2, line 1, after the word "the," to strike out "first" and insert "thirty-first;" in the same line, after the word "of," to strike out "July" and insert "December;" and in line 2, after the word "and," to strike out "three" and insert "two;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the rate of interest to be collected of any person owing arrearages of general taxes prior to July 1, 1899, now due to and the liens for which are held by the District of Columbia, shall be 6 per cent per annum, in lieu of the rate and penalties now fixed by law, and all accrued costs: Provided, That this act shall apply only to taxes paid on or before the 31st day of December, 1902.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

COLLECTION OF TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4372) to regulate the collection of taxes in the District of Columbia.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HOAR. My attention was diverted. I should like to know whether the bill makes any change in the principle of assessing property for taxes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It has nothing to do with assessment. It deals with the payment of taxes.

Mr. HOAR. It merely relates to the method of paying taxes?

Mr. MCMILLAN. It simply allows taxes to be paid twice a year, in two installments, instead of once.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF GEORGE I. ADAMS.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for the reprinting of a public document, to report it without amendment, and I should like to have it considered by the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution; and the Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to its consideration, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 4,000 additional copies of Bulletin No. 184, of the Geological Survey, lately issued, entitled "Oil and Gas Fields of the Western Interior and Northern Texas Coal Measures and of the Upper Cretaceous and Tertiary of the Western Gulf Coast," by George I. Adams, 1,000 for the use of theSenate, 2,000 for the use of the House, and 1,000 for free distribution by the Geological Survey.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator will consent to enlarge the number provided for the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is the number fixed in the resolution as it came from the House. We get one-third. If more copies are required, an independent resolution can be brought in.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 10, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 7, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, under the rules this day belongs to the Committee on War Claims; but the committee do not care to interfere with this large appropriation bill and the special order on the oleomargarine bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent of the House that the day after the oleomargarine bill is disposed of be assigned to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on War Claims, asks unanimous consent that that committee be permitted to have the day immediately following the disposition of the oleomargarine bill in lieu of this day, which under the rules belongs to that committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. LOUD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10847, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Territory of Arizona: For governor, $3,000; chief justice and three associate judges, at $3,000 each; secretary, $1,800; interpreter and translator in the executive office, $500; in all, $17,300.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that section relating to the compensation of the chief justice and three associate justices of the Territory of Arizona by striking out the word "three" and inserting the word "five."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 74, in line 8, at the end of the line, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "five."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. All right. I would like the attention of the gentleman from Indiana and the Committee on Appropriations—as many as are present. The statute gives the chief justice of Arizona $3,600. This Congress or one or two Congresses before this have given a beautiful lot of salaries to the justices of Hawaii.

I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana especially, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, how it is that in the Territory of Hawaii the expenses of their courts are $28,700 in this bill? They have, as you will find on page 76, a governor at $5,000 and a secretary at $3,000, a chief justice at $5,500 and two associate justices at $5,000; in all, $28,500.

On page 132 of the bill you will find a little more for the Territory of Hawaii; for the payment of the salaries of the clerk and reporter of the United States district court for the Territory of Hawaii, $3,000 and $1,200, respectively. In all, for the Territory of Hawaii, just as I said before, $28,500, and for the entire judicial system of the Territory of Arizona you have $12,000, all told.

Now, I venture the assertion that there has been more property interest involved and more cases tried in one term of the court of Arizona during the last year than in the whole Territory of Hawaii. The committee has made this appropriation for Hawaii, and the gentleman is very hasty in making the point of order against my amendment. I make the point of order against the appropriation for the Territory of Hawaii. If they have any statute to show why they are entitled to such enormous salaries as compared with the other Territories, they ought to do it.

I commend to the gentleman the same beautiful economy that is shown in cutting off the pitiful little $600 rightfully due the judges in Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma. They have given the Territory of Hawaii a regular supreme court, and they have also given it a nisi prius or circuit court.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him? The legislation in regard to Hawaii does not come from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will permit me to get through.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly; but I have the floor.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The legislation came from the Committee on Territories, and passed this House fixing all of these salaries in Hawaii.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Did not the legislation come from the same Committee on Territories to this same House fixing the salaries in the case of the other Territories?

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will just allow me to make a suggestion for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But does not the gentleman see that if the same Committee on Territories reported to this House and this House passed the bills in regard to the cases of other Territories, what reason, what equity, and what justice or what common sense can the gentleman say would permit such inequalities as this?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the case of Arizona we give the statutory salaries in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You give the statutory salaries, yes. When did you commence that?

Mr. HEMENWAY. A bill of that kind was passed a year or two ago.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, I think you will find, or the Clerk will find for you, that it is probably $3,600.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think you will find that the bill provides the statutory salaries.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Not only that, but this vigilant Committee on Appropriations, that sees, or should see, that no such unequal and unjust discriminating laws were passed, no matter from what committee they come. Our trial court is also our court of appeal as well, forcing the litigants to appeal from Cæsar unto Cæsar, while in this new and beautiful and delectable country we find that you give them all the courts that any State has.

Mr. RODEY. Including a clerk.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Now, I am not complaining because you have done Hawaii justice, but because you are doing the other Territories an injustice. Now, here are four judges in my Territory who do more work than the six justices and two courts in Hawaii. You force them to do more work in a year than they will possibly be called upon to do in six in Hawaii. You give them stenographers and clerks, and you give us nothing. We have to pay for them out of our own pockets. Now, I will ask the gentleman if he has found the law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I find that the statutory salary is $3,000, and they were formerly appropriated for at $2,600 for a long while, but the Committee on Appropriations raised the amount to $3,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Why did not the Committee on Appropriations use the same humanity toward the courts of Arizona that it did to Hawaii?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We followed the recent legislation as to Hawaii.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Recent legislation! Then it is because the wrong is old that you persist in perpetuating it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Arizona knows that during the time of Mr. Holman, who happened to come from that side of the House, when he was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, many salaries were appropriated for at less than the statutory amount. Something like 150 salaries were treated in that way. That practice was commenced at that time and has continued since, although there are not so many salaries appropriated for in that way now.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana if he approves of the course of that gentleman?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It has been approved of time and time again.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Can the gentleman suggest any reason why the statutory amount ought not to be allowed to our judges?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have allowed you all the statutes give, that is $3,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will ask a minute or two longer, Mr. Chairman, and then I will not trouble the committee any further.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman from Arizona be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the time of the gentleman from Arizona be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Now, the committee has without any consideration whatever, as far as I know—and if it has, the gentleman can show it—given to the far-off Territory of Hawaii, because it was based on recent legislation, a salary of $5,000, while it has persistently kept off from Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma $500 because it was an ancient wrong. What reason was there before the committee for giving $3,000 to the chief justice of Arizona and $5,000 to the Territory of Hawaii?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, the gentleman from Arizona is continually making his comparisons with the Territory of Hawaii. Now, you take the State of Tennessee——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We have nothing to do with Tennessee.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Let me make my comparison.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not want a comparison unless you compare Territory with Territory over which Congress has jurisdiction.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman declines to have a comparison made with the great States of the Union, where they do more work in a week than they do in a year in Arizona. What is the population of Arizona?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What is the population of that district you are talking of where they have so much practice in court?

Mr. HEMENWAY. What is the population of Arizona?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am not going to be led into a discussion of that kind by the ingenuity of my friend from Indiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman declines to answer my question.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am not declining to answer; but I want to know what the gentleman, as member of the Committee on Appropriations, has to do with the question what the States pay their judges? I am confining myself to the matter of these Territories, a matter over which that committee has jurisdiction.

I am attempting to show to the House that what the committee has done with respect to the Territories is injustice, and to show it by reference to what has been done with regard to other Territories, as well as Arizona. As it appears, the statute provides a salary of $3,500 in this case, and I am not going to run up against the rule or the point of order, and I therefore ask that my amendment be changed so as to name $3,500 as the salary instead of $5,000. I hope the gentleman will waive any objection he may have and allow this matter of justice to go through.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the governor of this Territory has a salary fixed by statute at $3,500. The judges have salaries fixed at $3,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If such be the statute, I know that the point of order is good.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I refer the gentleman to section 1879.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is the gentleman referring to the Revised Statutes or to a general appropriation bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the statute fixes the salary of the judges at $3,000 and if the gentleman insists on the point of order, of course the amendment must be ruled out; but I believe the gentleman wants to be fair. I have one suggestion to make to him: I ask him to treat this as a matter of justice upon a fair statement of the case.

The gentlemen holding these judicial positions are very good lawyers; they are very hard-worked men. Every one of them belongs to the gentleman's political party, so that I have no political ax to grind; I am asking nothing but justice to these judges. We are forced to pay taxes to meet the expense of the transportation of these judges from county to county.

If the gentleman would withdraw the point of order and agree to allow these men at least $3,600, I think it would be an act not only of grace, but of justice. A good lawyer in that part of the country can not afford to give up his practice to sit as a judge for less than $3,600. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order and recognize the justice of my proposition.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I must insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Chairman, I prepared yesterday an amendment in the same line with that which has been presented by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], because of the injustice that I saw in this appropriation, giving the governor of Hawaii $5,000 salary, as against an allowance of $3,000 salary for governors in other Territories; and giving to the governor of Hawaii a clerk and incidental expenses amounting to $3,000 additional, and also giving to the chief justice of Hawaii $5,500 and to the associate justices $5,000 each, as against $3,000 for the Territorial judges in New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Arizona. During the discussion that took place yesterday I made up my mind that perhaps, as these salaries in the older Territories are fixed by statute, I could not get them changed at this time and in this place in Committee of the Whole House. The appropriations in this line for the older Territories, as proposed by the committee, do seem unjust; and they show that if the committee considered that these salaries for the executive and judiciary of Hawaii are right, then it follows that the salaries for the governors and judicial officers of the other Territories are too small, supposing the conditions to be equal.

Because of the condition of things prevailing in the older Territories, because of the great amount of work that the judges there are doing (and as I have practiced law in New Mexico for almost twenty years I know whereof I speak), we have been forced at different times to give to our judges, in addition to the salaries allowed them by the Government of the United States, from $800 to $1,500 each. Every judge in New Mexico to-day receives $800, I think is the amount, in addition to $3,000 appropriated by the Government of the United States. It is because the salaries are insufficient that this extra compensation is paid. And therefore I am intending at some future time to bring in a special bill or proposition to increase these salaries so as to equal those paid to the Hawaiian judges. It is only reasonable that this should be done. I find no fault with the salaries paid to the Hawaiian executive and judiciary. It is probably just.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] has made a statement which would indicate that perhaps the judges in these Territorial districts do not do as much work as the State judges. But from personal knowledge I will say that in my opinion every judge of a Territory does in cases even as much as twice the work that is done by the State judges, because he not only has to sit as a committing magistrate at times, but as a nisi prius judge; and in addition he has to exercise the jurisdiction of a circuit or district judge of the United States, and has to sit as an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the Territory, so that it has come to be well known that he can not even have a thirty-day vacation during the whole year without permitting the public business to suffer and his work to get behind.

A salary of $3,000 in the older Territories for the governor and the judges is wholly inadequate, and if the Committee of the Whole shall agree to the amendment of the gentleman from Arizona, then I shall move that the allowance to judges in New Mexico and Oklahoma shall be changed so that the governors of those Territories may receive the same salary as the governor of Hawaii, and that our chief justice and associate justices may receive the same salary as the Hawaiian chief justice and associate justices, with an additional allowance for clerks and additional expenses.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RODEY] and of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, one moment. Is there any amendment pending before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending to strike out the last word, an amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is an amendment that is very familiar to the tongue of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY].

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just addressed the House [Mr. RODEY], as well as the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], who preceded him, have based their arguments for an increase in the salaries of the officials of their Territories upon the hypothesis that the judges in Hawaii have been receiving more than the judges in the Territories which they represent; and therefore they say the salaries of the judges in their respective Territories should be raised. Now, I have never heard any just or fair reason why the amount of the salaries which are paid in Hawaii should be paid. Hence their arguments are not well founded.

Mr. Chairman, let us see what they paid the officers in our old Territories of Florida and Louisiana. I refer now to the organic act of the Territories of the United States, as published by the Senate. We find that the judges in these two Territories received $2,500 a year, and some others much less, and this policy obtained throughout the Territorial life of Florida and Louisiana. The judges of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico are receiving more than the judges of Florida and Louisiana ever did, in days when we had no telegraphs, telephones, or railroads, when I dare say expenses were much more than they are now in any one of the Territories west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. Chairman, I say that it is wrong to increase the salaries of these judges in any of these Territories upon the hypothesis that the judges in Hawaii, who I believe are paid $5,000 a year for their services, are receiving fair salaries instead of extravagant salaries. These judges in Hawaii are not put to any extra expense. They sit in Honolulu the year around, as I understand it. They have splendid court rooms and facilities. And I want to add further, Mr. Chairman, that there is a movement in the Senate to increase the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Federal judges of the lower courts, and I believe the salaries of Senators; and now a movement is on foot here to increase the salaries of these Territorial judges and officers. When and where is this salary-grab policy to end?

I am opposed to such increases, and I shall remain opposed until the people throughout this country, in the Territories and outside of them, from East to West, from North to South, are paid the just claims that the Government of this country owes the people there for debts long since contracted, for which they, hungry and in penury, have been knocking at the doors of Congress for thirty or forty years for a settlement.

This Government, with an overflowing Treasury, is delinquent in paying the just debts of thousands for which it has received full consideration long ago, and yet Congress refuses to pay. I object to making flesh of one and bone of the other. These people who are pressing these claims are without any perquisites. They are without any office, some of them without clothing to cover their backs to come here and appeal for their rights, while others are without food with which to satisfy their hunger.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, they are left to appeal here for consideration which they do not receive. An unwilling hand is given them, when those who are in power, who are drawing high salaries, who have begged and pleaded with the appointing power to give them the positions which they hold, who have plenty of vacation, who have their mileage, who have clerks given them, who have everything that we have here in this House, are asking to have their salaries raised, and I presume they will succeed. I protest against it as long as those who have none of these privileges are mistreated and abused and their claims neglected and turned down from one session to another. To such a policy I am opposed. Fair dealing cries out against it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

[Mr. GOLDFOGLE addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. RODEY. If this Congress will relieve New Mexico from a Territorial condition it will relieve it of the necessity of paying any salary for governor and these other Territorial officers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am for making your Territory a State. [Loud applause.] If you can get your Republican friends to join us, we will do so.

Mr. RODEY. And if my Republican friends do less, they will do an injustice to the great Territory of New Mexico. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The task is your party's. The Democrats are willing, and said so in caucus a few nights ago—not a voice dissenting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For legislative expenses, namely: For rent, messenger, postage, stationery, fuel, lights, printing, and incidental expenses for secretary's office; for pay of members and officers of the legislative assembly, mileage, rent of rooms for the legislature and committees, furniture, stationery, printing, binding, fuel, lights, and incidentals, $24,250.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of reading from official documents the amount of salaries paid in several of our old Territories in the early days of the Republic. I read from a compilation gotten up by the Senate, entitled "Organic Acts of the Territories of the United States." It shows that by the act of March 22, 1822, in the "Territory of Florida" the following salaries were paid:

The governor shall receive an annual salary of $2,500; the secretary, $1,500; the judges, $1,500 each, to be paid quarter-yearly out of the Treasury of the United States. The members of the legislative council shall receive $3 each per day during their attendance in council and $3 for every 20 miles in going to and returning from any meeting of the legislative council, once in each session and no more.

In the district of Orleans and district of Louisiana, by the acts of 1804, the judges received $2,000 each, to be paid out of the revenues of impost and tonnage accruing within the said Territory.

The governor of the "Territory of Wisconsin," by the acts of 1836 and 1838, was paid an annual salary of $2,500 for his services as governor and as superintendent of Indian affairs. The chief justice and his associate justices each $1,800 and the secretary $1,200, and the members of the legislature $3 a day and $3 for every mile of travel to and from the sessions of the legislature. For contingent expenses, $350.

In the "Territory of Oregon," by the act of 1858, the governor was paid $1,500 as governor and $1,500 as superintendent of Indian affairs, and the judges $2,000 each, secretary $1,500.

In the "Territory of Minnesota," under the act of 1849, the governor received $1,500 for governor and $1,500 for superintendent of Indian affairs, and the judges each $1,800.

This is in painful contrast with the salary paid the governor in the Philippines, $20,000; four commissioners $15,000 each, and $5,000 for the judges. In Alaska the governor gets $5,000, raised from $3,000; and three judges $5,000 each. In Hawaii the governor gets $5,000. In Porto Rico the governor gets $8,000, and a commissioner of Porto Rico $5,000, and I believe the judges each get $5,000; while we see from this bill that the salaries paid these officers in the Territories west of the Mississippi are from $3,000 down to $2,500. Three States of the Union pay their governor $1,500.

This is all I have to say just now.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Territory of New Mexico: For governor, $3,000; chief justice and four associate judges, at $3,000 each; secretary, $1,800; and interpreter and translator in the executive office, $500; in all, $20,300.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Chairman, for the sake of getting it into the RECORD, I move to make the salary of the governor of New Mexico $5,000, the salary of the chief justice $5,500, and the salary of the associate justices $5,000, so as to put New Mexico in this regard on an equal footing with the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment, perhaps, will not be apparent until I shall have made an explanation. The Committee on the Territories of the House has recently had hearings on the subject of the admission of Oklahoma in the sisterhood of States. The testimony of her distinguished citizens show that in extent of area, in population, and in wealth her right to admissibility to the Union can not be questioned. She is entitled to statehood on all the precedents that can be invoked. The soil is fertile, the climate is salubrious, her people are equal to the best. The governors and officers are the best officials that can be found.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is not so much to discuss the subject of Oklahoma as it is to place upon record the party in power on the subject of consistency, which is many times said to be a jewel. The governor of Oklahoma rules more people as governor than does Governor Taft of the Philippine Islands, if in the calculation you exclude in the Philippines those who are within the trochas caused by the severe war measures adopted there, and which include the reconcentrado orders, and exclude the slaves of the Sultan of Jolo and his datos, who should be excluded for the reason that they are not taxed and should have no representation.

Mr. Chairman, we want some consistency upon this proposition of pay to governors. We want to see if you consider it about right to pay a governor in a domestic Territory $3,000 and one in a foreign Territory $20,000. It is a long time since the Republican party placed the salary of the governor of the Philippines at $20,000, and gave him an official residence in addition, and provided pay to the other officers sent there in like proportion. The country is complaining about extravagant salaries—a salary list that pays to the sanitary officers of the Philippines the same amount that is paid the governor of Oklahoma, a salary list that pays the assistant district attorney and deputy assessor in the Philippines a salary equal to that paid to the governor of Oklahoma. To give the party in power here a chance to meet the criticism which may be unjust to them—we shall see by this vote—we place the situation of the governor of Oklahoma against the governor of the Philippine Islands and ask for a vote upon that proposition.

I feel that the members on this side, not being responsible for the salary of Governor Taft, of the Philippine Islands, need not vote for this amendment, that only strikes out the salary of the governor of Oklahoma, although I shall do so. I propose, if my amendment is adopted, as it must be if the Republican party is consistent on this subject by their votes—I expect to follow it up and ask to have inserted an amendment making it $20,000, so that the governor of Oklahoma may be on equal terms with the governor of the Philippines. Why give the governor of the Philippine Islands $20,000 and not give the same amount to the governors of Oklahoma and New Mexico and Arizona?

This calls to mind the situation that prevails in all the colonies of our country—a policy of might makes right and greed triumphs over all. A few days ago there was presented to this House by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] a resolution to annex or to invite Cuba into the sisterhood of States. It was upon the gentleman's resolution that Hawaii was annexed. Hawaii to-day, by the census report, has a population of 154,000, presenting the unfortunate spectacle to this House and to a liberty-loving country, and one whose labor sustains and protects it in peace and in war, of 61,000 Japanese, 26,000 Chinese, and 38,000 Hawaiians, all of which classes are equally dangerous to the interests of American labor. I suggest to the gentleman from Nevada that when he sends his invitation to Cuba to enter our portals that he append below his resolution a little footnote that this is the same old colonial policy of the United States and governed by the sentiment, "'Will you walk into my parlor?' said the spider to the fly."

Cuba will find out, as all others have found out that have been annexed to us, indeed as she already has found out, and as the fox found out in the fable when asked by the lion to go into its den, that the tracks all lead one way.

The toilers all along the line in the United States will suffer, and severely suffer, by this new and dangerous policy.

It ever will be so, so long as we have a foot of foreign territory peopled by a race alien to and different from our own, and which, by reason of such condition, is unfit to bear the responsibilities or share the benefits of the Republic.

The Chinese, Japanese, Cubans, Filipinos, Porto Ricans, and the inhabitants of the Danish West Indies are all of this class and should not be brought in competition with American labor.

Mr. Chairman, the payment of these salaries to the officials of the Philippine Islands is justly chargeable to the opposition; so, therefore, to test their consistency and that we may equalize the salaries of the governors, I hope to be supported in this proposition by the vote of the Republicans.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make a point of order against the amendment, that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the Clerk again read the amendment? I did not catch its purport exactly.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 13 and 14 strike out the words "three thousand dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana does not claim that Congress can not refuse to appropriate salaries?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move to amend the amendment so as to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I believe I have stated that if this amendment should be adopted, as I have no doubt it will be, it is my purpose to offer an amendment substituting $20,000, so that the governor may go on and perform his official duties, and for the same price as that of the governor of the Philippines. I shall not vote for the $20,000, but present it to the Republicans for consistency.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suppose the gentleman understands that on this bill we have nothing whatever to do with the salaries paid in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Surely not; but the question is the same in principle. You tax the Philippines, make them pay at the point of the sword, and with the money so wrung from them you pay a governor of your selection $20,000, and I want to see whether gentlemen will be consistent and vote the same salary to the governor of Oklahoma, a domestic and deserving Territory of our country.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has brought into this controversy the resolutions which I had the honor to offer the other day in regard to Cuban annexation. Debate is now under the five-minute rule, and I shall require more time than the rule allows to properly answer the gentleman. I therefore request additional time, say fifteen minutes, for this purpose.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed fifteen minutes to discuss the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has referred to the resolutions regarding the annexation of Cuba which I introduced the other day, and he has stated that I ought to append to them a footnote that "this is the same old colonial policy of the United States."

I am at a loss to know what the gentleman means by the expression, "old colonial policy." I was under the impression that the colonial policy was a new policy, inaugurated only within the last few years, involving an abandonment of the traditional policy of the country, which regarded newly acquired territory as infant States, to be governed under the Constitution and the equal laws of the Republic, its people entitled to citizenship in the Republic, and enjoying the confident assurance that ultimately, when population and wealth justified statehood, it would be accorded by the Union.

Under this old and traditional policy the thirteen original States developed their great Northwest Territory into five noble States; under that policy Florida was acquired and developed into a State; under that policy the great Louisiana purchase was made, with its development later on into magnificent States; under that policy the extreme western portion of our continent, including California, was acquired by treaty with Mexico, all of it developed into sovereign States, with the exception of Arizona and New Mexico, which, though held for so long a time without statehood, were yet governed under the Constitution, with citizenship to their people, under laws equally and beneficially operative wherever the flag of the Republic waved. Nothing was then heard of a subject people. Nothing was then heard of dependencies, of territory appurtenant to and not a part of, and the other phrases which have been so glibly framed in pursuance of a new policy.

And if the gentleman will read the resolutions which I have had the honor to introduce he will find that they contemplate not an acceptance of the new colonial policy so recently inaugurated, but a return to the old and traditional policy of the early days of the Republic.

These resolutions declare:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) providing for a reduction of duty on Cuban sugar and inviting Cuba to become a part of the United States.

Whereas by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902," approved March 2, 1901, the President of the United States was authorized to leave the government and control of the island of Cuba to its people so soon as a government should be established in said island under a constitution which, either as a part thereof or in an ordinance appended thereto, should define the future relations of the United States with Cuba, substantially as in the said act stated; and

Whereas on the 12th day of June, 1901, the convention organized in the island of Cuba for the purpose of framing a constitution for the government of said island adopted an ordinance making provisions substantially in accordance with the requirements of the aforesaid act of Congress; and

Whereas on the 1st day of October, 1901, said convention performed its remaining duty by adopting an electoral law providing for a general election throughout the island of Cuba, to be held on the 31st of December, 1901, to choose governors of provinces, provincial councils, members of the house of representatives, and presidential and senatorial electors; and

Whereas such electoral law also provides that from the 24th day of February, 1902, the several bodies of electors thus chosen shall meet and elect a president, vice-president, and senators; and

Whereas the President of the United States is authorized, after the organization of the government of the island of Cuba as aforesaid, to leave the government and control thereof to its people; and

Whereas it is represented by the military government of Cuba, as well as by the business men, bankers, planters, and other representatives of Cuba, that an economic crisis is pending, owing to the low international price of sugar; that the present crop, consisting of about 850,000 tons, can not be marketed, and it will be unprofitable to harvest and grind it, and that lack of employment and general distress are sure to follow the failure to harvest and grind the existing crop; and

Whereas Cuba seeks a commercial union with the United States whereby sugar and other products of Cuba may enter the United States either free of duty or with a reduced duty in exchange for certain concessions to be made in the admission of certain American products to Cuba; and

Whereas it is the opinion of the Congress of the United States that the best commercial union between Cuba and the United States can be accomplished by political union, by the annexation of Cuba to the United States as a Territory, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, with the assurance of ultimate statehood; and

Whereas it is represented that the sentiment of Cuba is favorable to a political as well as a commercial union, but that time is necessary for its accomplishment, as there is no government now organized there capable of assenting to a political union: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to admit Cuban sugars, produced from the present crop, upon the payment of three-fourths of the present duty, in consideration of a reciprocal arrangement upon the part of Cuba, giving to the American products entering Cuba such concessions or preferential duties as he may approve and deem advisable, such arrangement to continue until the 1st day of January, 1903.

SEC. 2. That in the meantime the Republic of Cuba is invited to become a part of the United States of America and her people to become citizens of the United States, with the assurance that Cuba will be entitled at first to a Territorial form of government under the Constitution and laws of the United States, with a Delegate in Congress to represent her people, and that ultimate statehood will be granted when, in the judgment of the Congress of the United States, it is advisable to admit Cuba, including such other West India islands belonging to the United States as may be deemed advisable, as a single State in the Union, to be called the State of Cuba.

Does the gentleman find in these resolutions a single line which indicates that they are pursuant to the new colonial policy? Cuba is to be annexed to the United States with her consent; not by violence, but by the free act and will of her people. She is to become a part of the United States, not a military dependency or a subject colony. Her people are to be citizens of the United States, not subjects. She is to have a Territorial form of government under the Constitution, not outside of it, and she is to be entitled to the equal operation of our laws, including our tariff laws. She is to have a Delegate in Congress to represent her people, and she is to have the assurance—that ultimate statehood will be granted when, in the judgment of Congress, it is advisable to admit Cuba, including such other West India islands belonging to the United States as may be deemed advisable, as a single State in the Union, to be called the State of Cuba.

The annexation of Cuba means the expansion of the Republic, not the development of an empire. It follows the time-honored policy of the country under which expansion meant the acquisition of contiguous continental territory and of adjacent islands, essential to our military and coast defense, the purpose being to give this country a scientific boundary, to secure the expansion of domestic commerce and to minimize naval and military expense by securing the control of the natural military outposts of the country.

What is the occasion for these resolutions? It is represented to us that an economic crisis is approaching in Cuba; not that an economic crisis exists there to-day, but that an economic crisis is threatened in the near future, and that this economic crisis has its origin not in the rupture of the relations between Cuba and Spain, or in the late civil war or in the present military occupation, but in the low price of sugar, the world's price of which is lower than it ever has been. You all know that until recent years the world was supplied mainly with sugar from the cane. While Cuba was torn by a civil war which reduced her output of sugar from 1,000,000 to 100,000 tons annually, the protected sugars and the bounty-fed beet sugars of the world took the place of Cuban sugars in the world's markets. After the war, when Cuba sought to restore herself to her former position, she found that the markets which she had supplied were occupied, but notwithstanding this she commenced vigorously the production of cane sugar, and she has expanded it this year to 850,000 tons—nearly her maximum output before her civil war—and this increased product has weighed down the markets of the world, already overburdened, so that to-day the international price of raw sugar is only about 1¾ cents per pound.

Now, Cuba seeks—what? She seeks to come into the markets of this country, the protected markets of this country, a country which produces only one-third of her sugar consumption, and she asks that the tariff barriers be thrown down, that her product be allowed to enter this country that she may be enabled to receive, not the international price of sugar to which she is now confined, but our domestic price, raised by a protective tariff to double the international price, the price here for raw sugar being about 3½ cents a pound, the international price being about 1¾ cents. What does that mean to Cuba? Why, sir, from her present crop she will receive only $25,000,000, not sufficient, according to her statement, to pay the cost of production. If her sugar is admitted free to this country she will receive double that amount—$50,000,000—and she will thus obtain from this country a commercial union that will enable her people to get $25,000,000 more annually for their sugar product than they can get under existing conditions.

Objection is made by the protected sugar interests of America that reciprocity will so stimulate the production of Cuban sugar as to seriously affect the protected sugar industry of this country, if not destroy it. It is claimed that it is unfair to give Cuba the advantages of a commercial union with this country without the restraints and burdens which a political union would involve, namely, subjection to our labor and Chinese-exclusion laws, as well as to the increased cost of supplies in a protected market. Under reciprocity Cuba would have free access to the cheap labor marts of the world, whilst our sugar producers would be confined to the high-priced labor market of the United States.

I have no doubt that an economic crisis is approaching in Cuba. I have no doubt that unless some relief is given the labor now engaged in grinding the cane and planting the fields will, in the future, be unemployed and that an economic crisis will be attended by acute distress. We all know what acute distress means in Latin-American countries. We all know that the government is held responsible, and that disorder and civil strife follow. The lack of employment in Cuba, arising from a financial crisis, would undo the work of the last three years and subject the new government to all the dangers of discontent and turbulence.

It is clear that some relief should be given to Cuba. The question is, How can this be done most effectually without injury to our own industries? To take Cuba into our commercial union by reciprocity would be to free her from the burdens and restraints of a protective system which has in this country raised the price of all supplies and products above the international level, and has also so restricted the labor market by Chinese exclusion and immigration laws as to maintain a higher level for labor than the international level. Thus Cuba would have the advantage of a production on the low international level of labor and supplies, but would sell on the higher level of our protected markets, which, in sugar, would secure to her double the price she would otherwise get. The effect would be to rapidly stimulate the production of sugar in Cuba by every device known in the way of cheap labor. Cheap laborers would be imported from Europe. Chinese would be imported, and thus we would put our sugar producers practically in competition with the cheapest labor of the world.

Would it not be much better to invite Cuba to enter our political union, in which she would share all the advantages of commercial union and at the same time be subject to the restraints of our labor laws and to the expenses of a protected market, and meanwhile make a reduction in our duty on Cuban sugar of one-fourth, confining its operation to one year? This would enable her to receive from her present sugar crop six or seven million dollars more than she would otherwise receive. It will relieve her from her distress. It will enable her planters to grind their present crops, but it will not stimulate, as too much concession would, excessive planting in the future, which will add to the existing overproduction.

Cuba asks commercial union with this country. I contend that the best kind of commercial union that Cuba can have is that which political union involves. Such union should not be brought about by force or coercion. We must treat with free Cuba. Annexation by force would not be justified. It must be accomplished, if at all, by the free act of the Cuban people. At present there is no machinery in Cuba by which the popular will can be tested. But the Cuban constitution has been adopted. The Cuban congress will meet soon, Cuban government will be organized, and the United States will then leave the government and control of the island to the people of that island. Cuba will then be in a position to express her will, and it is only necessary to tide over the present emergency by a temporary measure, such as I have introduced, reducing the duty on Cuban sugar one-fourth for one year and inviting Cuba to become a part of the United States under a Territorial form of government, under the Constitution, not outside of it, her people to be citizens, not subjects, with the assurance that ultimately statehood will be granted. Thus economic distress will be avoided, and one year will be given for deliberation and action, the result of which can not be doubted, for every interest, political, sentimental, and commercial, will point to political union.

Now you say, Why do we ask Cuba to unite herself to the United States of America? Gentlemen, the people who have been before us representing Cuba and Cuban interests stated to us that the tie binding Cuba to this country is a close one, close in any event by reason of her proximity; closer still by reason of the exaction of the Platt amendment by this country. They speak of her as a ward of this country, as being under the protection of this country, and that statement is true; for under the Platt amendment we are entitled to go into Cuba and suppress disorder which threatens her independence. Under the Platt amendment we are entitled to take possession of her posts for military defense. We have also placed restrictions upon her treaty-making power; not so far as commercial treaties are concerned, but any treaty which may involve her ultimate independence. So that she is now in the position of a ward of this country.

Certainly no brighter future can be secured to Cuba than that presented by ultimately becoming one of the sisterhood of States. Meanwhile she will occupy the position of an infant State, as a territory under the Constitution and equal laws of the United States—not a mere dependency, like Porto Rico, or a subject territory, like the Philippine Islands.

From the standpoint of Cuba's material interests there can be no question as to the advantage of political union and consequent free trade with this country. She will immediately profit to the extent of $25,000,000 annually on sugar alone, as the duties on her present crop will amount to that.

It may be urged in objection that the suggestion of present annexation is premature; that Cuba must have her experience of independent government. My answer is that every year of postponement will lessen the desirability of political union with Cuba. Should she have independence without reciprocal trade relations she will be without markets for her product, and economic distress will undo the republic. Civil strife and public disorder will reign everywhere. Sanitary precautions will be neglected, and Habana will again become the breeding spot of the yellow-fever pest, and the United States might be compelled to take hold with a strong hand.

Should she maintain her independence with reciprocity she will continue her career as a country of pratically one product—sugar. The sugar industry will be unduly stimulated up to the full point of American absorption. The world will be scoured for cheap labor. Asiatic contract labor will be introduced, and all the objectionable conditions of tropical and semi-tropical life now existing there will be exaggerated. Under reciprocity her population five or ten years hence will be much less desirable for annexation than it is now, composed as it will be of Chinese and other imported cheap laborers. By coming into our political union Cuba will immediately secure the highest degree of freedom enjoyed anywhere upon the earth, and with it a large market for her varied products. These products will not threaten our sugar industry so seriously as they would under reciprocal trade arrangements, for the reasons that the restricted labor laws of this country will apply and will raise the cost of production to such an extent as to prevent overstimulation of her industries, while her supplies will be bought in the high protected markets of this country instead of the cheap markets of the world.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have only a few minutes remaining.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. We will extend your time. I want the gentleman to be just to himself.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will yield to my friend later, if sufficient time is given me.

Now, what does this commercial union mean? What do the beet-sugar men say? What do the cane-sugar men of Louisiana say, these men who have been assisted by a protective tariff that has overstimulated that industry in this country, and which bids fair to put them all upon stilts, rendering their prostration more disastrous in the future? What do they say? Why, they say that they would rather have annexation, that they would rather have Cuba in the political union, than have a commercial union which will give her tariff advantages.

And what is their argument? Why, they say if you strike down the barrier of the tariff wall you admit her products free into this country. And how does she produce them? She produces them by the cheap labor of the world. You will stimulate her production so that it will advance by leaps and bounds. Where will she get her labor? She will get the cheap laborers of Europe, she will get the cheaper laborers from China. She will get them under contract, as she did twenty years ago, at the rate of $4 a month, when men were put under contract for eight years, and their contracts were sold to the highest bidder.

Annexation is bound to come in the future, bound to come because of the intimate relations of these countries, bound to come because Cuba is now our ward and we are bound to protect her. It is bound to come because Cuba will demand it, and it is bound to come because the sentiment of the United States will demand it. And if it is to come I would rather have it come now than twenty years from now. I admit that much of the population of that country is now undesirable; but how much more undesirable will it be after we have given her reciprocity arrangements which will stimulate her sugar industry and permit the immigration to that country of the cheap laborers of Europe and of the degraded labor of Asia. I wish to have these negotiations now, so that our labor laws can apply to that island, so that they can be restricted in their labor colonization, so that they will be put upon the same market for their domestic supplies as we are, so that they will be on a par with our domestic producers in the production of sugar.

I much prefer political union, for that involves the best kind of commercial union that can be established between the two countries.

Such annexation is entirely in line with the traditional policy of the country, which has always contemplated the peaceful annexation, under the Constitution, of contiguous continental territory, and of adjacent islands essential as part of our coast defense. When the time for statehood comes, Cuba, Porto Rico, and other West India islands in our possession can be incorporated into the Union as one State, thus doing away with the danger of overrepresentation in the Senate.

I do not believe in reciprocity agreements which necessarily involve favoritism to certain foreign countries and which will necessarily arouse jealousy and secure the hostility of less-favored nations. I believe that there should be but one boundary to the Republic. I believe that Cuba should be within that boundary, and that within it we should have free trade and without it we should have impartial trade, and that partial trade, such as that promoted by reciprocity treaties, should as a rule be avoided.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How do you want it to come in—as a Territory or a colony?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not as a colony; that is contrary to my resolution. It provides that Cuba shall come into the United States and form a part of our political union as a Territory, with the assurance of ultimate statehood when the people of the United States are willing to concede it, and collect all these other islands in the West Indies into a single State, not numerous States, thus doing away with the danger of overrepresentation in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And New Mexico was given that promise nearly fifty years ago.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true; but New Mexico is going to have statehood, though long delayed. It will be long delayed in the case of Cuba; but in the meanwhile her people will be under the equal laws of this country, including the tariff laws, and her government will be under the Constitution and not outside of the Constitution; her people will be citizens, not subjects.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman understands the labor situation here. He introduced the resolution that passed the House for the acquisition of Hawaii. What satisfaction does he get out of the annexation of those islands under the Constitution? We find to-day that it has 26,000 Chinamen, more than one-half of whom have gone there since the annexation, and there are 61,000 Japanese, and there are 38,000 Hawaiians and mixed blood, who are no more desirable in competition than the others. Now, what satisfaction does the gentleman get out of these facts of history as a matter of competition with American labor?

Mr. NEWLANDS. There are not as many Chinese there to-day as there were at the time of annexation. And the reason why Japanese have increased is because we have not passed a law to prevent the Japanese from going there. I want to say, however, that the Chinese have not come into Hawaii since annexation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the gentleman very well knows that they are coming into Hawaii.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Chinese are decreasing to such an extent as to produce a pressure for labor in Hawaii.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. They are coming to Hawaii and coming to this country here, and will come as long as we have island possessions and boats ply between the ports.

Mr. NEWLANDS. They are not coming to the Territory of Hawaii. They are constantly diminishing. The Japanese are coming there, and to this country, because, as I said, we have no exclusion law regarding them, and they simply come under the general emigration laws.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does not the gentleman from Nevada regard them as an equally undesirable class of immigrants?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think the Japanese are as desirable as a white population would be. I favored the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands, although I knew a large portion of the population was undesirable, for I felt that the advantages of the acquisition of that great military outpost of the Pacific, commanding our defensive line, and of the halfway station to the commerce of the Orient, would more than compensate for the disadvantages arising from the acquisition of an undesirable people.

The population of Hawaii was small, aggregating not more than 120,000 people; and let me say that since annexation our Chinese-exclusion law and our immigration laws have been applied to those islands, and have resulted in a very large increase in the wages paid to labor, and that this change will gradually result in the introduction of white labor into those islands. I will further say that, if the United States will pursue a wise policy regarding the public lands of those islands, and will dedicate them to settlement as homes in small holdings, there will be a gradual change in the population of those islands that will amaze the gentleman.

We have not done our full duty to Hawaii since annexation. We have not sufficiently inquired into her economic conditions and so legislated as to promote independent and self-respecting citizenship there. But improvement has already been made, and improvement will continue to be made, particularly if we gradually change their system of landed proprietorship and concentrated ownership.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I ask that his time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Nevada be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman answer this question? I have listened with a great deal of interest to your argument about Cuba. What objection have you, and what reason is there under your resolution why Cuba should not be admitted to statehood instead of being admitted in a Territorial condition?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Because I do not think Cuba is as yet prepared for statehood.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Why is it not prepared?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think its people have become sufficiently familiar with American ideas and American institutions to entitle her at present to become a State of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. We have instances, as I recollect, in the history of our country where a State was admitted without the intermediate condition of a Territory.

Mr. RODEY. California?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. California, and Texas was another, probably. Now, is it not a fact, and do you not believe it to be a fact, that the solution of all the troubles that we are gathering around our people with regard to reciprocity and tariff would be to invite Cuba into statehood, and do it upon the basis of the constitution that Cuba has already adopted? Why not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would not deem that advisable, but rather than have the present conditions and perpetuate them for all time, with the probability of a civil war and strife there, with the probability of a yellow-fever pest, with the probability of constant friction, I would be willing to take Cuba on almost any terms. But I believe Cuba is prepared now to come into the political union as a Territory, with the assurance of ultimate statehood. Such is the statement of those who appeared before our Ways and Means Committee, and who were competent to speak for Cuba.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Does not the gentleman believe that the interests of Cuba are threatened with strangulation and destruction on the question of sugar and tobacco?

Mr. NEWLANDS. So it is represented; and if the present abnormally low price of sugar remains, I have no doubt that there will be an economic crisis.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. What relief will Cuba get under a Territorial condition?

Mr. NEWLANDS. She will come within the operation of the tariff laws of the United States. That tariff wall will be built around Cuba and will fence her into the United States instead of fencing her out. For the 850,000 tons, her present crop of one year, for which she can get to-day only $25,000,000, she will get $25,000,000 more, and if she continues to produce at that rate she will get an annual bonus of $25,000,000 by being a part of the United States.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Does not the gentleman believe that if we invite Cuba to come in as a State, under the constitution that she already has, with such changes as should be made to make it appropriate and applicable to a State under our Government, that all of these troubles would cease to exist, and that Cuba would become more rapidly Americanized than under any other conditions?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think that statehood would relieve her economic conditions just as much as a Territorial form of government, and no more. But I should regret to see her come at the present time into this Government as a full-fledged State. I believe there is a period of amalgamation through which any country differing with ours in language and institutions should pass before becoming a State in the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But the gentleman does believe that it would be better for her to come in as a State than to remain as she is now?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Now, just one minute. The gentleman says that they are not fit for statehood now. They have been near us since the flood. If it takes them that long to gain a knowledge insufficient for statehood, how long will it take them to gain the knowledge to fit them to be American citizens to be entitled to statehood?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That depends on the speed of our Americanization of that island. I believe it would be very rapid, and such was the evidence before our committee, which I would be glad to quote if time permitted. Under certain conditions I am prepared to vote for statehood, but I believe Cuba will accept a Territorial form of government, and I should prefer to have her for some time in that relation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the gentleman from Nevada think that she will accept a Territorial form of government in view of the legislation which we are now enacting toward the colonies?

Mr. RODEY. She will not if the same promises are made to her that were made to New Mexico, at least not in the light of what New Mexico has received in the way of fulfillment of those promises.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The gentleman will note that under these resolutions she is admitted as a part of the United States, and not as a territory subject to the United States; that the resolution expressly provides that her people shall be citizens of the United States, and not subjects.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; but did not the Supreme Court hold, under the gentleman's resolution annexing Hawaii, that Hawaii was not a part of the United States, and the Constitution did not extend there?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That was before the legislation organizing Hawaii as a Territory. Under the act of organization she was placed under the Constitution and not outside of it, and to-day our tariff laws apply to her and there is free trade with the States. Cuba's position would be similar under the resolutions I propose, which are not mere resolutions of annexation, but which fix the status of Cuba and her people.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Under the gentleman's resolution, did that court not hold that Hawaii is not a part of the United States? You will find the opinions in 12 and 13, Hawaii Reports.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Did not the Supreme Court practically decide that New Mexico was not a part of the United States, that Arizona was not a part of the United States under the taxing clause of the Constitution?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think it did in effect, though possibly it might distinguish between an organized and an unorganized Territory.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is there anything in your resolution superior to that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nevada has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Nevada be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks that the time of the gentleman from Nevada be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to say that I am in sympathy with what I know the gentleman from Nevada intends, but would his resolution, if adopted, put Cuba, as a Territory, upon any higher plane than New Mexico and Arizona now are, as a law question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. As a matter of law, possibly not; as a matter of honor, yes——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Ah!

Mr. NEWLANDS (continuing). Because this resolution invites her to come into the Union under the Constitution and laws of the United States, her people to be citizens, not subjects.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Nevada to this fact, that the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico became a parcel of the public domain—that is as indefinite phrase as I can use—under a treaty with Mexico, whereby their inhabitants were to become citizens of the United States, and they were to become a part of the United States. Yet it is contended by the highest authority upon that side that we have a right to treat them, if we want to, just as we have treated the Philippines or Porto Rico.

Now, would the gentleman's resolution be any higher appeal to our honor than the treaty with Mexico? Would it put Cuba upon any higher plane legally?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me state to the gentleman that we have not violated that understanding with either Arizona or New Mexico.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But we have asserted the right to violate it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is another thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We have no motive to violate it, because, as regards Arizona and New Mexico, there has been no sugar or no tobacco interest to stir up Congress to do it. But the sugar and tobacco interests will still continue to operate so far as Cuba is concerned. The motive will be there; and we have asserted the right.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But we can provide for that in these resolutions. I quite sympathize with the gentleman in his view regarding the decision of the Supreme Court, to which he refers. I regard that decision as unfavorably as the gentleman himself does. But if these resolutions, which will bind the good faith of the United States, expressly declare, as they do, that we invite Cuba to a Territorial form of government, with assurance of ultimate statehood and with a temporary provision for a Delegate in Congress, and that all the privileges and guaranties of the Constitution shall apply to her and her people, I do not believe that the Congress of the United States—whatever may be the view of its power—will violate that assurance; and I do not believe that to-day you can get the Congress of the United States to pass discriminating laws against Arizona or New Mexico, even though the Supreme Court should declare that Congress has the power to do so. Besides that, I do not believe that Congress could violate the provisions of its solemn act inviting Cuba into the Union, or that the Supreme Court would so decide.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I admit that there never will be any such discriminating laws applied to Arizona and New Mexico, because the motive does not exist. If the motive did exist—if there were any private interests to bring about such discrimination—I believe there would be discriminating laws of that description, because this Government, as the gentleman knows, is run to a very large extent by private interests.

But what I wanted to ask the gentleman was this: Talking of the matter of good faith, could there be any higher plane of good faith on which any nation could plant itself than the plane on which we planted ourselves by the utterances of Congress and the President at the time of the inauguration of the Spanish war, to the effect that we were not carrying on a war for territorial aggrandizement or the greed of conquest? Yet we have violated that declaration.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true so far as the spirit of the war resolutions is concerned. We have adhered to the letter as to Cuba but we have violated the spirit as to the Philippines. We made no express declarations regarding the Philippines, however, and the resolutions which I have introduced regarding Cuba fix her status so explicitly as to leave no room for construction or evasion, and I believe that Cuba can rely upon their enforcement both in honor and in law.

Mr. RODEY. The gentleman from Nevada said that this Government has not violated its promise as to New Mexico and Arizona. I wish to say that when New Mexico became a part of this nation the promise of the treaty was that her citizens should be admitted to all rights and privileges as citizens of the United States at a time to be judged of by Congress. Now, I want to ask him whether he thinks fifty-five years is a reasonable time within which to have carried out that promise according to what was in contemplation of the parties to that treaty when it was signed?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think not, as to statehood; but the people of that Territory have become entitled to the full privileges of citizens of the United States. They are not subjects; they are citizens of the United States, and in pursuance of the original declaration both national parties in the last campaign pledged action regarding statehood, so that though statehood may have been somewhat delayed, it is assured, and this side of the House recently adopted unanimously a resolution in favor of giving statehood to New Mexico.

APPENDIX.

[Extract from statement of Colonel Bliss, United States Army, collector of the port of Habana, before the Ways and Means Committee. See Hearing, pages 382-390.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I understand it, Colonel, the Cuban people wish to come into commercial union with the United States without being subjected to the burdens that political union would involve, such as exclusion of the pauper labor of Europe and restriction of Asiatic immigration. The contention, you understand, on the American side, in behalf of the beet-sugar industry and others, is that it would be unfair to have a commercial union when the Americans are handicapped by restrictive legislation as to immigration and cheap labor, and the Cubans are not.

A GENTLEMAN. And the payment of internal taxes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, I ask you whether or not the Cuban people are prepared to come into political union with the United States so that they will stand upon an equality in the production of sugar?

Colonel BLISS. I think, judging from my own personal acquaintance and from information derived from it, that the great majority of Cubans are ready.

Mr. NEWLANDS. They are ready to come into political union?

Colonel BLISS. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do you mean by that that they are willing to come in as a part of the United States under a Territorial form of government under the Constitution, their people being citizens, and wait until the United States is ready to admit Cuba to statehood, or do you mean that they would require immediate statehood?

Colonel BLISS. From all those people who are interested in any way personally in the island of Cuba I have never heard but one statement—that they would be glad to come in as a Territory, as a colony, or remain under the present military administration, or in any way so as to become recognized as a part of the United States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, then, if the United States Government, in the place of tariff concessions, should, by joint resolution adopted by Congress, invite Cuba to come into our political union, first as a Territory, with the assurance that in due time she would be admitted to statehood, do you think that invitation would be accepted by Cuba?

Colonel BLISS. I think it would; yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. NEWLANDS. Colonel, do you think the Cuban climate is adapted to Americans?

Colonel BLISS. Yes, sir; perfectly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That they can live there generation after generation without degeneration?

Colonel BLISS. I can not answer you further than my own generation, and, in fact, not for all of that one. I have lived there three years, and have worked hard in all the variations of climate that they have there. I feel as well now as I did when I went there, and I see no reason to think that if I were there twenty-five years longer it would make any difference.

Mr. NEWLANDS. You were speaking a few moments ago regarding the sentiment there as to political union with the United States. Do you derive that sentiment from communications with Spaniards, or from communication with Cubans?

Colonel BLISS. With Spaniards, with Cubans, with laboring men, and with everybody except a certain class of Cuban politicians.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is a small class, is it?

Colonel BLISS. Comparatively a small class; yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Take the leaders in the late war with Spain—the Cuban leaders—what is their sentiment regarding it?

Colonel BLISS. I think that, as a matter of pride, at least, all of those men would prefer to see an independent Cuba. I think—in fact, I know—that there are some of these who have no hesitation in saying that after the pride of their people has been satisfied they will gladly welcome the next step in the solution of this problem.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As a permanent arrangement, do you think they would prefer simply a commercial union with this country, with tariff concessions on both sides, or political union, which, of course, would involve complete commercial union?

Colonel BLISS. That I do not know, sir; but I am satisfied that in bringing about this commercial union of which you speak, any condition that you choose to impose will be gladly accepted; any modification in any law, or the creation of any new law, will be gladly made by Cuba to secure that which is all she asks now, I believe, viz, closer commercial relations with the United States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do you think their disposition as to a political union with this country arises from these commercial considerations; or do other considerations enter into it?

Colonel BLISS. I think it all grows out of the commercial considerations.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is represented here that there is intense hostility upon the part of Cubans to America.

Colonel BLISS. There is on the part of a certain outspoken element; yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is that a large proportion.

Colonel BLISS. I think it is a very small proportion, largely represented by the political men of whom I speak, whose immediate hope for the gratification of their pride and their ambition is in the establishment of an independent government.

* * * * * * *

Mr. NEWLANDS. You have spoken of the American influx that would follow settled conditions there. Do you think Americans there would take hold of the soil and till it? Do you think they would take up small holdings there?

Colonel BLISS. Oh, yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is that climate adapted for Americans in that kind of work?

Colonel BLISS. Perfectly; perfectly. It is warmer in winter and cooler in summer than almost any part of the United States with which I am familiar. I do not know of a more delightful climate, winter and summer, than the island of Cuba, so far as concerns any part of the island that I have visited. Of course, the effect that would be produced on a second generation or a third generation is something that I do not know and can not foresee; but I am acquainted with many Americans, Englishmen, Germans, Frenchmen, and Spaniards who have lived in Cuba from a quarter to a half a century, and who have suffered no deterioration that I can see, either physical or otherwise. I know a good many Americans, small planters, people who have come down and bought 30, 40, or 50 acres of land and are raising vegetables and oranges, who have found that the business is not successful because they can not export anything to the United States. They find that the price they get for a barrel of oranges on the wharves of Habana is counterbalanced by the duty they have to pay in New York.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do these Americans labor themselves, or do they employ peon labor?

Colonel BLISS. Oh, those whom I have in mind are people that go out and work in the fields themselves.

[Additional statement of Miguel Mendoza on behalf of the Cuban delegation before the Ways and Means Committee. See hearing, page 403.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, Mr. Mendoza, you heard Colonel Bliss's statement regarding the sentiment there as to political union with this country, or annexation?

Mr. MENDOZA. Yes, sir; I quite agree with him.

[Extract from statement of Henry T. Oxnard, president American Beet Sugar Association. See hearings, page 178.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then your contention is, if a reciprocal arrangement is made with Cuba, the labor of this country will eventually be competing with Chinese labor in Cuba?

Mr. OXNARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, you said if Cuba is annexed to this country and brought inside of our tariff wall and free trade prevailed, of course——

Mr. OXNARD. Exactly.

Mr. NEWLANDS (continuing). Between all the States of this Union and Cuba that those conditions would be such that the beet-sugar interests of this country could compete with the production in Cuba. On what do you base that? Do you base that on the assumption that American wages will prevail there?

Mr. OXNARD. Exactly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And also the cost of materials and supplies will be the cost in a protected market, instead of in a free-trade market?

Mr. OXNARD. That is my position exactly, and I pointed to the case of Hawaii, which, by practical test, greatly increased the cost of producing sugar under annexation. I will let the gentleman from Hawaii tell you exactly what it is, but there has been a tremendous increase in the cost since it has been making sugar in a protected market.

Mr. SWANSON. You would prefer having free trade with Cuba than an immense reduction in the tariff. I understood you prefer having Cuba annexed and have free trade as it is between the States of the Union than to have an immense reduction in the tariff?

Mr. OXNARD. I do not hesitate a minute on that point, not one.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has descanted considerably on the salary of Governor Taft as governor of the Philippine Islands. Now, as the matter was stated yesterday here by me in debate and today by the gentleman from Indiana, there needs to be made an explanation, so that we may not be ignorant of the facts when we criticise this $20,000 salary of Governor Taft. The fact is, as you gentlemen all know, that Governor Taft, when appointed to this place, was receiving a salary of $6,000 as circuit judge, which he resigned. At the urgent solicitation of President McKinley, he accepted this office. It is true, it was his own voluntary act.

Now, what are the conditions which surround him, and what are the conditions which surround every other white man in that climate? The fact is, when he goes there he stares the hospital in the face; and Governor Taft, although he has not been in the hospital, has been quite sick, and had to return home on that account. We see in the morning's paper that General Funston has just come off the surgeon's table for the second time, after having been only about two years in the Philippine Islands, where he showed himself to be a strong, sturdy, magnificent American soldier. He had to return to regain his health, following the rule and practice. Judge Ide is on leave of absence for his health. So that in accepting a position over there Governor Taft, I take it, very naturally said: "There are great risks for me to run. I want to be paid commensurate with the service." And so they gave him $20,000, and his associate commissioners get $15,000 each—four of them.

Now, the hardship and the ground for criticism, in view of the amount paid, is this, that the judges, local and supreme, in the Philippine Islands get only $5,000 a year. The climate affects their health just as much, with a $5,000 salary, as it does the health of the governor and the commissioners, with their large salaries; but the Filipino foots the bill. He is taxed, battle scarred, bruised, stripped of his property, the victim of war with us, the victim of the tyranny and outrage of Spain in the past, yet he is footing the bill, and he says, "Is it fair? Give us soon a government of our own and we will furnish less expensive officers." The Americans foot the bill to some extent, in this, that we pay a tariff to get our goods into the Philippine Islands. The Filipino pays it twice. He pays an export duty when he ships goods out, and he pays an import duty when he ships them in. He pays an export and import duty to us to get his goods here; a double tax if the House bill becomes the tariff law of that island.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If I may interrupt the gentleman, I want to suggest one further explanation of the amendment. If this carries, which I think it will, I propose to provide that $10,000 of this shall come out of the Philippine treasury.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. To be brief, I know the climate. I simply want to state these facts, because I know them of my own personal knowledge. I have never been in Oklahoma, but you all know that is a healthy country. I know a great many people from my own country go there, and it seems to me that the representative from that Territory [Mr. FLYNN] is a very healthy-looking man. So, the question of climate cuts no figure in the size of a salary in Oklahoma. There are no climatic or tropical diseases there to decay the white man's body and mind. There is in the Philippine Islands.

Now, what are the official reports of the health conditions in the Philippine Islands? What does Surg. Charles F. Mason say in General Sternberg's last report. He says:

I do not believe there is any such thing as acclimatization of white men in tropical climates, and that their health gradually deteriorates and they become less fit for active service.

This expert who has studied the diseases of the Tropics, and who went there for the purpose of investigating them, says there is no such thing as acclimatization of the white man in tropical climates.

What does Surgeon Greenleaf state officially in his last report?

Seasoned soldiers of proper age, disciplined and intelligent enough to appreciate the primary rules of hygiene, and moderate in their habits, remain. The proportion of sickness among such men as these would be surprisingly small but for two adverse factors.

The first is the inevitable undermining of the strength of the most robust by tropical service.

Was there any man ever more robust than Governor Taft, any man more robust than Judge Ide, any more robust than General Funston, any more robust than our colleague from Iowa [Mr. HULL], who has been sick since he returned from the Philippine Islands? Further, what does another one of these experts say?

Dysentery prevails throughout the year, but there is a marked increase in the number and severity of the cases at the commencement of the rainy season and a progressive increase in both respects until a maximum is reached toward the end of August. It is by far the most serious disease which attacks the white soldiers in the Tropics, both as regards its mortality and its invaliding effects. Out of 32 deaths from disease in the Twenty-sixth United States Volunteer Infantry during its first year of service in the Philippine Islands, 16 were from dysentery and its complications and 10 more from typhoid fever.

BOILS, ABSCESSES, AND LEG ULCERS COMMON.

Boils, abscesses, and leg ulcers are very common, the latter especially during campaign, when it is impossible to keep the underclothing clean. Though not dangerous to life, these seemingly trifling ailments put a large number of men out of service temporarily and correspondingly swell the sick report.

DEAFNESS AND EAR TROUBLE.

Suppurative inflammation of the middle ear with perforation of the drumhead is of frequent occurrence. It is insidious in its commencement, often deafness and sudden discharge of pus being the first symptoms noticed. Upon examination an acute catarrhal pharyngitis is usually found.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have leave to print. We want to go ahead with the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I can finish in three minutes. I simply want the House to hear the facts on this question, which shows the justice in one sense and injustice in another of this $2,000 salary.

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have three minutes' time?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not want to do or see done any injustice to any man on earth, whether he is under the Constitution or outside of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed for three minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, what else does this expert say?

BUBOES AND SUPPURATION PREVALENT.

Another interesting condition is the prevalence of buboes, both in the groin and axilla, without discoverable point of origin. Frequently a careful examination of the tributary lymph district fails to reveal any lesion whatever, and this though the bubo may proceed to suppuration.

Bathing in the waters in the Philippine Islands produces deafness; it produces the dobey itch, that bores into the flesh and bores to the bone, and continues to bore, which can not be cured unless you burn it or come back to the cold climate of America or go to Japan. It continues, if it is not cured, until it becomes a running ulcer, and that is a condition which occurs to the healthy as well as the weak—white, brown, and black people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have heretofore stated that the death rate in Manila was 30 per cent of the children. I take the figures I use from General Sternberg's official figures.

Manila has a population of 242,730, and the board of health of Manila reports in the last war report, at page 138 and 139, and further says:

The number of deaths was 8,671, an annual rate of 42.54 per 1,000, exclusive of the Army and Navy. Twelve cemeteries and one crematory are in charge of the board of health.

Out of 254 bubonic plague cases 199 died. From March 10 to April 10, 1901, the total number of prisoners of war was 4,149; total sick, 1,336. Between August 1, 1900, and April 30, 1901, the total number of invalids sent home for treatment was as follows: Regulars, 1,132; volunteers, 2,861; total, 3,993. Between April 30, 1900, and April 27, 1901, there were 526 men sent home from disability, and this report states:

This is a large number to lose in less than a year's time, but every care has been taken to select cases for discharge, and it is not likely that the figures will be improved upon as new troops come in.

The average daily report of deaths was 3.6 as compared to 4.7 in the last report (of the War Department) between the months of August 1, 1900, and April 30, 1901.

On page 138 this report states:

The transportation of over 4,000 invalids, insane, and men to be discharged on surgeons' certificate of disability to San Francisco has been successfully carried out, and from what I can unofficially gather, great improvement is taking place in the condition of the large majority. Deaths have occurred from dysentery and other diseases, but on many occasions after careful deliberation and on the urgent prayers of the patient the men were sent home as a last resort.

This is from General Greenleaf's report, May 31, 1901.

The Philippine climate causes insanity, but the patients recover by returning them home to the United States; that is, 46 out of 180 which came from the Philippine Islands last year recovered by reason of the sea trip and coming home.

Colonel Greenleaf says:

Almost all the cases of melancholia will be found upon examination to be due to nostalgia, and as a rule in these cases the prognosis is very favorable provided the patient is transferred to the United States.

Now, let us see what the effect of the climate is on the soldiers who go to do battle. The soldiers in China were in the Philippines and in Cuba.

Now, what was the death rate among them? The official figures give the death rate as 33⅓ per cent, and those who were wounded in battle at 66⅔. So that in considering the question of $20,000 for the governor and $5,000 for the judges, this question should be considered, along with giving $15,000 a year to the commissioners, and the fact that it is paid out of the Philippine treasury from taxes that the Filipino people have to pay themselves, excluding the tariff tax we may have to pay, as I have explained. So far the Filipinos have paid the taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For legislative expenses, namely: For rent of office, furniture, fuel, lights, clerk hire, printing, postage, ice, messenger, stenographer, janitor, office fixtures, and other incidental expenses of the secretary's office; for pay of members and officers of the legislative assembly, mileage, rent of rooms for the legislature and committees, furniture, stationery, printing, binding, fuel, lights, and incidentals, $24,250: Provided, That the legislative assembly shall not consider any proposition or pass any bill to remove the seat of government of said Territory from its present location: Provided further, That said legislative assembly shall not make any appropriation or enter into any contract for a capitol building.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 76, after the word "building," in line 11, add:

"And provided further, That the governor shall appoint a commission of three persons, not more than two of whom shall belong to the same political party, who shall reapportion the Territory into legislative and council districts prior to the next Territorial election, and the sum of $1,000 is hereby appropriated to pay the salary of the commission and necessary expenses."

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, the legislative assembly of Oklahoma is composed of 13 members in the council and 26 members in the lower house. They are apportioned among the various counties of the Territory in proportion to their population. Last August there were 4,000,000 acres of new land opened up in Oklahoma, out of which were created three new counties. There is no method whereby the people residing in those three counties—and I presume there are from 75,000 to 100,000 people in them—are included in any legislative district, and whereby they can have even a vote in the next legislature unless there is a reapportionment made in the Territory. Similar legislation was enacted by Congress providing for a reapportionment in the Fifty-third or Fifty-fourth Congresses. To allow the new counties representation in the Territorial legislature it is necessary to have such an amendment as this. Hence I have offered this amendment in the interest of the people who are there. I believe that they should be given the same rights of representation that the other people have who reside in the various other counties in the Territory.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the amendment is necessary and just. It applies to the three new counties created by the act, under which a part of the Indian reservation was opened up, and as the gentleman from Oklahoma very properly says, there are probably from 75,000 to 100,000 people in those counties who have been added to the territorial jurisdiction. No apportionment was made in reference to the new Territory, and it is nothing but just and right that that Territory should be reapportioned, so that these citizens will have the right to be represented both in the house and in the council. They call the senate the council in that Territory and the house of representatives and council makes the legislature; and these three counties under the reapportionment proposed by this amendment would be allowed representation in the legislative body.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LACEY. Is there no provision in the original act by which you could have additional representatives for these three counties without having this new apportionment?

Mr. FLYNN. The organic act stops that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For repair of granite columns at northeast approach to the building, $1,525.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 87, after line 21, insert:

"That hereafter no public building or the approaches thereto other than the Capitol building and the White House, in the District of Columbia, shall be used or occupied in any manner whatever in connection with ceremonies attending the inauguration of President of the United States, or other public function, except as may hereafter be expressly authorized by law."

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, the item just mentioned is for the repair of the granite columns at the gate approaching the east of the War Department. Before every inauguration for President and Vice-President for many years the public buildings and grounds have been given up to a private committee of the District of Columbia for the purpose of raising funds for facilitating the inauguration. After the first inauguration of President McKinley the Commissioner of the Pension Office, in a public statement, said that in that Department alone the Government had paid $70,000 for the salaries of employees that had been turned out for a period of days in order that the Pension Office might be decorated and that these ceremonies might go on. And in addition to that there were innumerable damages. Complaint has been made from every department for the past eight to twelve years, and after every inaugural it is announced in the papers that that will be the last abuse; but we forget by the next inauguration. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions have always opposed these things, but a bad precedent has embarrassed them.

During the last inaugural a private committee asked to use the Pension Office and these public grounds, and put all of the employees out of employment on pay for eight days, delayed the pensions of old soldiers, at an enormous expense to the Government, and had three fires started in the building. This committee of private citizens covered the front of the public property of the Government with seats, that the committee rented to the public, and for the same purpose a platform was built to rent to the public over the splendid gate at the east of the War Department. It was given on condition that it would be removed immediately after the ceremonies and that no damage should be done. I am told that these seats were rented for $5 each. After the ceremonies were over the commander at the War Department ordered it removed. No attention was paid to him for days. In the meantime the platform and seats were burned, and in burning these the splendid granite columns, of the value of about $3,000, were nearly ruined. Three members of the Cabinet met and asked the commander in charge to demand that this committee of the District of Columbia make this good. They appealed to the committee to put up $3,000 to repair this entry way to the War Department. The committee ignored the commander. He went back and appealed to the committee, saying that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury had demanded that this request be heard, that it was very offensive, and that it was not due courtesy to these officers that they should be ignored.

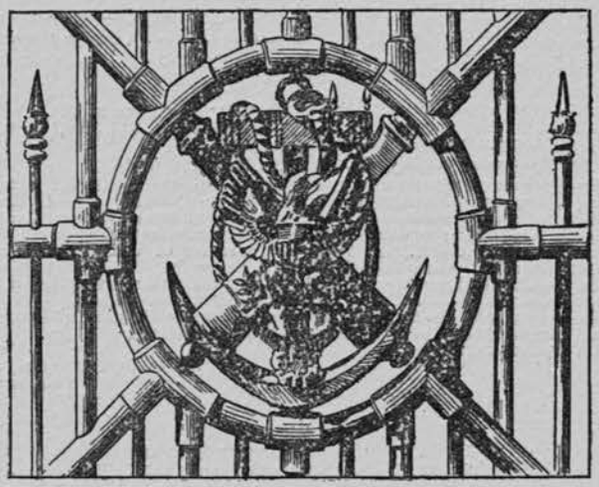
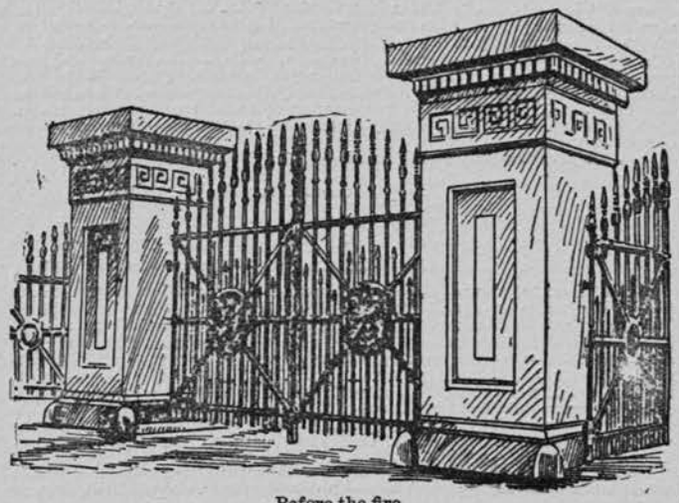
They had a meeting, and these private committeemen decided unanimously that they would not contribute one cent to the repair of the damages done by reason of this fire. They said they were not a private corporation, that they were not individually responsible. Then the Government official said to them: "You have speculated on the Government's property, you have paid all of the bills, and now you have $5,000 in the treasury as a surplus; you apply that to making these damages good, and if it is not sufficient we will not ask any more."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.



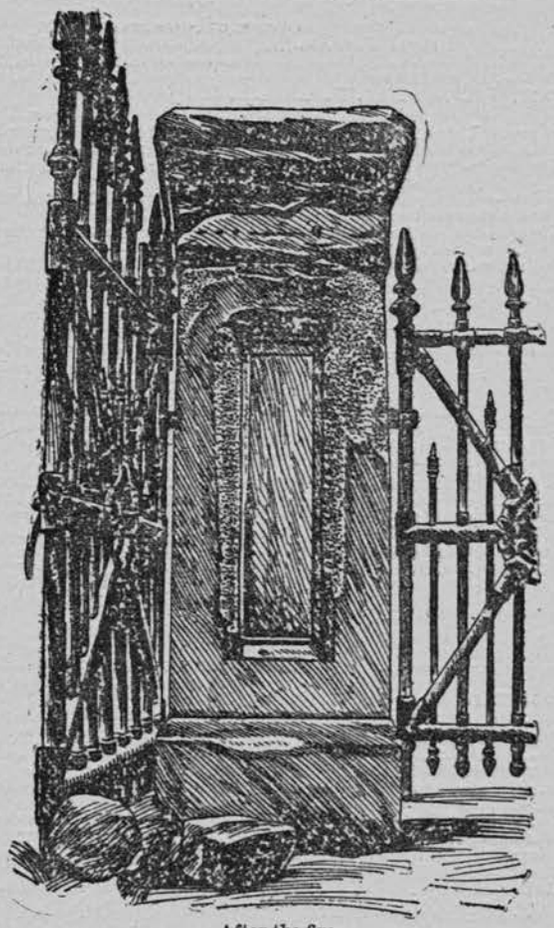
Mr. BELL. By the consent of the committee it was understood that I should have what time I wanted, not to exceed thirty minutes. I want about five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the time of the gentleman from Colorado will be extended five minutes.



There was no objection.

Mr. BELL. Now, they subsequently ignored the demand of the Secretary of War and everybody else and took that $5,000 and distributed it in the District of Columbia, and we are called upon now to make this appropriation for the purpose of rebuilding what this private committee destroyed while they were using this property. Here the War Department presents that splendid gateway, that splendid approach, before this private committee was permitted to build this platform, and then they show in another column how it was left after the fire.



THE DAMAGED GRANITE COLUMNS IN FRONT OF THE STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Escutcheon placed on the gates by General Casey, marking them as the approach to the State, War, and Navy Building.

Before the fire.

After the fire.

The correspondence is extensive, showing the most arrogant treatment from this committee to the entire force of the Government in charge. They voted unanimously that they would not apply a dollar to this repair, though they had had the use of this property and had rented it out for large profits, and it was destroyed while so occupied by the committee.

Now, as I understand, every member of the Appropriation Committee whom I have heard express himself is in favor of this amendment, and I do not want to go further, except I will ask unanimous consent to further extend my remarks in the RECORD, as I want to print the entire correspondence between this private committee and the officers of the Government, showing their arrogant conduct relative to the injury of this magnificent gate and entrance and the gross abuse of the confidence of the officers of the Government, and the disposition to heap every possible expense on the Government, whether right or wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. What is the gentleman's amendment in brief?

Mr. BELL. The amendment is that hereafter no building except the Capitol and White House, nor the approaches to buildings, shall be used in these inaugural ceremonies without the express consent of Congress.

Mr. HEMENWAY interrogated Commander Baird as follows:

On the top of page 152 you have an item, "for repair of granite columns at northeast approach to the building, $1,525." What is the matter with those columns?

Commander BAIRD. Those columns were burned. Here is the building as General Casey finished it [exhibiting photographs]. That was the approach, and here is the way the gates looked then. When the inauguration stand was put up, they let it catch fire, and that is the way the columns look now. Here is the escutcheon placed on the gates by General Casey, marking them as the approach to the State, War, and Navy building. You see here the anchor of the Navy Department, the eagle for the State Department, and the gun for the War Department.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Under what authority did this committee erect a stand there at the inauguration?

Commander BAIRD. There was a resolution, I believe, which permitted them to erect a stand on public reservations.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Was their attention called to the damage done by this fire?

Commander BAIRD. Yes, sir; I have the whole correspondence here, a copy of it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will you furnish copies to go into the hearing, and you can tell us briefly what they are?

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT,

The COMMISSION FOR THE
STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING,
Washington.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to report that the fire which occurred last night in the observation stand which extends over part of our iron gates, on Executive avenue, has seriously damaged the corners and carving on the granite pylons which carry the gates.

These gates were erected out of the appropriation for this building, and, as approaches, have ever been regarded as part of the building.

I beg permission of the Commission to address the chairman of the inaugural committee, claiming indemnity.

With great respect, your servant,

G. W. BAIRD,
Commander, U. S. N., Superintendent.

DEAR SIR: The fire which occurred last night in your observation stand, which extends over the approaches to this building, has seriously damaged the granite pylons which carry the iron gates.

The Government will expect your committee to make good the damages.

By direction of the Secretaries of State, War, and the Navy.

Very respectfully,

G. W. BAIRD,

INAUGURAL COMMITTEE, 1901,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1901.

GEORGE W. BAIRD, U. S. N.,
Superintendent State, War, and Navy Department Building,
Washington.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 16th instant informing me that the Government would expect the committee to make good the damage to the granite pylons in front of your Department, caused by the burning of the President's reviewing stand, is received.

All the circumstances in the case will be considered, and the matter laid before the inaugural committee, and further reply made to your letter. There is no doubt but what the action of the committee will be satisfactory to the Government.

Very truly,

JOHN JOY EDSON, Chairman.

D.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT,
STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., April 4, 1901.

Mr. JOHN JOY EDSON,
Chairman Inaugural Committee, Washington Loan and Trust Building.

DEAR SIR: Thanking you for your letter of the 19th ultimo, in reference to the destruction of the stone columns of our iron gates, I beg to invite your attention to the remarks in the Evening Star of last night, in which is printed the subjects your committee proposes considering at its next meeting. In this list of subjects I find no mention of our granite columns. I trust you will not overlook that subject at your meeting.

With great respect, your servant,

G. W. BAIRD.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT,
STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., April 15, 1901.

JOHN JOY EDSON, Esq.,
Chairman Inaugural Committee, 1901, Washington.

DEAR SIR: A month ago, in obedience to the order of the Secretaries of State, War, and Navy, I addressed you a letter calling attention to the injury done to our granite columns by the fire which occured in your observation stand.

In your reply, dated 19th March, 1901, you informed me that the circumstances would be considered and laid before the committee, and further reply would be made to my letter; you added that "there is no doubt that the action of the committee will be satisfactory to the Government."

It is currently reported that your committee had a meeting about ten days ago and that the subject of the damage to our columns was discussed.

It is due to the three Cabinet officers that you inform them, as promised, what action was taken by your committee in reference to our damaged property.

With great respect, your servant,

G. W. BAIRD,
Commander, U. S. N., Superintendent.

April 16 Mr. Edson made a personal call upon the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department building in reference to the superintendent's letter of the 15th. Colonel Bingham was present.

Mr. Edson disclaimed discourtesy to the Secretaries of State, War, and Navy in his delayed replies to their communications, and stated that in the interim his business had been greatly neglected and he was trying to catch up.

He said his committee could not afford $3,000 to replace the columns. The superintendent said, "It will not require $3,000," and "If the Secretary of War will allow me to set a piece in the large column, I can then, by cutting down the larger pieces to make like parts for the smaller ones, get it done inside of $1,700." Colonel Bingham said, "No one would expect you to give beyond the means you have in your possession." Mr. Edson stated that he would go with Commissioner Macfarland the next day and lay the matter before the Secretary of War. The superintendent understood that the purpose of the visit to the Secretary was to propose setting the piece in the large column to reduce expense of repairs. Instead of this, however, Messrs. Edson and Macfarland requested the Secretary of War to remove the columns entirely. This the Secretary refused to allow.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT,
STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., April 22, 1901.

The COMMISSION FOR THE
STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING,
Washington.

GENTLEMEN: On the 16th of March I reported that a fire, which occurred in one of the observation stands the night before, had seriously injured the granite columns which carry the iron gates, the eastern approaches to this building. By direction of the Secretaries of State, War, and the Navy, I addressed a letter to the chairman of the inaugural committee (copy attached and marked "A"), stating that the Government expected that committee to repair the damages.

The reply of the chairman (copy inclosed and marked "B") stated that he had no doubt that the action of his committee would be satisfactory to the Government, and, after a meeting of his committee, he would communicate further with me.

His committee met and discussed the subject, but he failed to inform me of its action, and, after about ten days, I addressed him a letter (copy inclosed and marked "C") requesting that he inform the Secretaries of the action of his committee. I have not been able to get a further written reply from the chairman, and, as the interests of the Government are suffering, I feel obliged to bring the matter to your attention.

In conversation with the chairman and other members of the committee I learn that there is objection in this committee to their acknowledging responsibility, lest it establish a precedent which might involve future similar committees. They also believe that, not being incorporated, they can not be held responsible. They do not deny that their profits exceed by far the amount necessary to repair the damages; they admit having funds more than sufficient to make good our loss.

The committee's existence has a legal status, as shown in joint resolution designated Public Resolution No. 5, of the last session of Congress (copy inclosed), which, I think, imposed responsibilities on the committee. The committee accepted responsibility by filing a bond to indemnify the Government for any damage that might be done to the Pension Office building, which they used as a ballroom. The Secretaries of State, War, and the Navy, having confidence in the committee, granted freely every concession it sought. It therefore appears to me that the committee is morally, if not legally, bound to repair the damages, and not take advantage of a technicality. If they had no public funds available for the purpose there would be an excuse, but they have the funds—the profits of their observation stands and the ball.

Their stand, which was built of highly combustible material (white pine, tarred paper, etc.), was not promptly removed, as had been done before, but remained for more than ten days, even though I had requested its prompt removal.

As the committee no longer replies to my letters, nor in any way signifies what its purpose is, I beg that you invoke the highest legal advice as to its responsibility, jointly or severally.

With great respect, your servant,

G. W. BAIRD,
Commander, U. S. N., Superintendent.

INAUGURAL COMMITTEE, 1901,
Washington, D. C., April 26, 1901.

Commander G. W. BAIRD,
Superintendent State, War, and Navy Department, City.

SIR: Since the receipt of your last two letters of the 4th and 5th instants, calling the inaugural committee's attention to the damage caused by fire by the burning of the President's reviewing stand, and the resulting damage to the gates and pylons under your charge, Commissioner Macfarland and myself have had an interview with the Secretary of War explaining the position taken by the inaugural committee.

The inaugural committee, after careful consideration, are of the unanimous opinion that it should not be expected to pay these damages.

Thanking you for the courtesies always extended to the committee during the arrangements for the inaugural ceremonies, I remain,

Very respectfully,

JOHN JOY EDSON,
Chairman.

I.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT,
STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., April 27, 1901.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

SIR: I beg to inclose a letter just received from the chairman of the inaugural committee, and to invite your attention to my letter of the 22d instant on the same subject.

The committee used Government property and space for profit, and now has in its possession about $5,000, for which it has no other responsibility than to repair the damage done our handsome granite columns; but these gentlemen now declare themselves of "unanimous opinion" that the Government should not expect them to make good the damage done to our gates by one of their employees.

With great respect, your servant,

G. W. BAIRD,
Commander, U. S. N., Superintendent.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 30, 1901.

SIR: Referring to our conversation the other day about the responsibility for the injuries to the granite posts and iron gates appurtenant to the State, War, and Navy building, caused by the burning of the inauguration stand, it seems to me that, assuming that there was no negligence or failure of duty on the part of the persons employed to erect and remove the stands, the expense of repairing the injury ought to be treated as one of the expenses to be paid out of the fund raised by selling the seats on this very stand and other similar stands, and that the committee ought not to apply that fund to any other purpose, leaving the injury caused by the erection of the stand—which gave rise to the fund—to be paid by the Government, under whose license the stand was raised.

I suggest that the amount necessary should be paid out of the fund, under a stipulation that the payment should not be deemed to be acknowledgment of any personal responsibility or the discharge of a personal obligation, but the appropriation of a portion of the fund to meet an expense properly and specifically chargeable against the fund itself.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

JOHN JOY EDSON, Esq.,
Chairman Inaugural Committee, 1901,
Washington Loan and Trust Building, Washington, D. C.

The conduct of this private committee should be a timely warning to the Government in the future against turning its property on the inauguration of a President over to any private parties, and other unseeming conduct should also cause Congress to make early provisions against future combinations to raise prices on the recurrence of these occasions. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses of branch offices at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Savannah, New Orleans, San Francisco, Portland (Oreg.), Portland (Me.), Chicago, Cleveland, Seattle, Buffalo, Duluth, Sault Ste. Marie, and Galveston, including furniture, fuel, lights, rent and care of offices, car fare and ferriage in visiting merchant vessels, freight and express charges, telegrams, and other necessary expenses incurred in collecting the latest information for the Pilot Chart, and for other purposes for which the offices were established, $30,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the provision in the bill as it now stands is a change of existing law. Under existing law Port Townsend has one of the branches of the Hydrographic Bureau. The effect of the amendment is to make the provision comply with the existing law. The provision in the bill is subject to a point of order, but I do not wish to make it.

We have no districts in the State of Washington, but I have the honor to represent in part the whole State. I am endeavoring to represent each locality fairly, regardless of size or location. While there is considerable rivalry, and commendable rivalry too, among the different cities of our State, I am satisfied that Seattle would not desire to do anything to the prejudice of the city of Port Townsend. Seattle is a large city, Port Townsend is a small one. The people of Seattle are too large hearted, however, to ask for this change. They do not desire to take from any city anything it now has, and I am satisfied that they have not requested it. It was probably suggested by some of the hydrographic force.

Port Townsend is the port of entrance and clearance of Puget Sound. It is the point where ocean vessels first touch, and where they first report to the officers of the custom-house. There is a Government building at that point, and I suppose that this office could be accommodated in that building without any additional expense for fuel, light, rent, etc.

I think this change of existing law ought not be made, and that the office ought to be continued at Port Townsend, at least until some strong reason is presented here in favor of a change.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. JONES of Washington was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer another amendment, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "building," in line 23, on page 91, insert the following:
"Five copies of any pilot chart issued by the Hydrographic Office shall, on request, be delivered to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress without charge."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order that this is new legislation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have nothing to say as to that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. This is evidently a change of law.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

Office of the Secretary: For compensation of the Secretary of the Interior, $8,000; First Assistant Secretary, $4,500; Assistant Secretary, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,500, and $500 additional as superintendent of the Patent Office building and other buildings of the Department of the Interior; additional to 1 member of board of pension appeals, acting as chief of the board, $500; 9 members of a board of pension appeals, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, at $2,000 each; for 20 additional members of the board of pension appeals, to be selected and appointed by the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year 1903, at $2,000 each; 3 additional members of said board of pension appeals, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and to be selected from the force of the Pension Office, at $2,000 each; special land inspector, connected with the administration of the public-land service, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and to be subject to his direction, $2,500; 4 special inspectors, Department of the Interior, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and to be subject to his direction, at $2,500 each; clerk in charge of documents, $2,000; custodian, who shall give bond in such sum as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, $2,000; 7 clerks, chiefs of division, at $2,000 each, 1 of whom shall be disbursing clerk; 4 clerks, at $2,000 each; private secretary to the Secretary of the Interior, $2,250; 14 clerks of class 4; 14 clerks of class 3; 18 clerks of class 2; 28 clerks of class 1, 2 of whom shall be stenographers or typewriters; returns office clerk, $1,200; female clerk, to be designated by the President, to sign land patents, $1,200; 5 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 clerk, $900; eight copyists; 2 copyists or typewriters, at $900 each; telephone operator, $900; 3 messengers; 6 assistant messengers; 15 laborers; 2 skilled mechanics, 1 at $900 and 1 at $720; 2 carpenters, at $900 each; 2 skilled mechanics, plumber and electrician, at $900 each; 1 laborer, $600; 6 laborers, at $480 each; 1 packer, $660; conductor of elevator, $720; 4 charwomen; captain of the watch, $1,000; 40 watchmen; additional to 2 watchmen acting as lieutenants of watchmen, at $120 each; engineer, $1,200; assistant engineer, $1,000; and 7 firemen; in all, $314,410.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, page 97, insert after the word "dollars" the words "and for additional compensation while the office is held by the present incumbent, $1,500."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it is necessary for me to state the necessity for this appropriation. It was not reported by the full committee, although canvassed in the committee, but I was placed at liberty by the committee to offer the amendment on the floor of the House. I believe it ought to be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indian Office: For the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $4,000; Assistant Commissioner, who shall also perform the duties of chief clerk, $3,000; financial clerk, $2,000; chief of division, $2,000; principal bookkeeper, $1,800; 5 clerks of class 4; 15 clerks of class 3; draftsman, $1,600; draftsman, $1,500; architect, $1,500; stenographer, $1,600; stenographer, $1,400; 11 clerks of class 2; 26 clerks of class 1; 14 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 stenographer, and 1 clerk to superintendent of Indian schools, at $1,000 each; 17 copyists; 1 messenger; 4 assistant messengers; 3 laborers; messenger boy, $360; and 4 charwomen; in all, $138,320.

Mr. MONDELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 22, page 103, strike out the words "one clerk" and insert "two clerks."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is intended to furnish an additional clerk for the superintendent of Indian schools. I ask to have read a communication from the Secretary of the Interior relative to the necessity for this additional clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, November 20, 1901.

SIR: I have the honor to request that one clerk of class 2 be allowed the superintendent of Indian schools. A clerk of the class named for the superintendent is an absolute necessity, owing to the fact that at the present time strong efforts are being put forth to place the schoolroom work upon a more practicable basis, as will be seen by the course of study for the Indian schools recently issued by this Bureau; and in order that the schools may be properly graded the superintendent is compelled to spend much time in the field.

I am glad to state that the recommendations of this office relative to giving agriculture and industrial occupations the importance that is their due are receiving cordial support throughout the service.

Respectfully,

W. A. JONES, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

P. S.—I respectfully request that this matter be made special, as it is desired to have this item incorporated in the estimates before they are printed.

W. A. J.

[Indorsement.]

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
November 21, 1901.

Respectfully forwarded to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury approved, and it is recommended that the item be incorporated in the estimates of Indian Service for fiscal year 1903.

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think it is not neccessary for me to add anything to what the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior have said relative to the necessity for this additional clerk.

I desire to add to my amendment this further clause—

Amend the total of the paragraph by adding $1,400.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the two propositions of the gentleman's amendment will be treated as one.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, is not this new legislation? Where are the gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee? They have been very industrious this morning in making points of order on new legislation. Where are they now?

The CHAIRMAN. It is rather late to raise a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MADDOX. I wanted to know whether this proposition was acceptable to gentlemen on the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not think the amendment is subject to a point of order. It is authorized by law; but the amount to be added to the total should be $1,000 instead of $1,400.

Mr. MONDELL. I am perfectly willing to modify my amendment in that respect.

Mr. MADDOX. Is there any law providing for this clerk?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know.

Mr. MADDOX. Well, I am sure I do not. I ask the gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is simply an extension of the service.

Mr. MADDOX. That is not the question. Has this office had this clerk before?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; there is a law providing for this. Section 161 of the Revised Statutes authorizes an increase of the force of clerks of classes 1, 2, 3, and 4. It has been uniformly held, so far as I know, that this is a service which can be increased under the rules. It is always in order to increase the number of clerks of the classes referred to in section 161 of the Revised Statutes. So that this amendment is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. MADDOX. You are satisfied that it is a proper thing, are you?

Mr. CANNON. I am not informed about that matter. The gentleman heard the communication from the Secretary read. I am not in charge of the bill. The gentleman from Indiana is in charge of it.

Mr. MADDOX. I do not see him in the House at this moment.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] is also in charge of the bill. I have no knowledge about it, except the communication that was read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MADDOX. If you are all content with it, I have no objection to make.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is not subject to the point of order. That the Indian service requires this additional clerk is very evident, from the communication of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The superintendent of Indian schools has charge of all the Indian schools in the United States.

Mr. MADDOX. If you will allow me, I did not make the point of order. I simply inquired if it was not subject to a point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. I would say to the gentleman that it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. MADDOX. The chairman did not seem to know, and I wanted to bring out the information.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rural free-delivery service: Superintendent, $3,000; supervisor, $2,750; chief of board of examiners of rural carriers, $2,250; 3 clerks of class 4; 6 clerks of class 3; 25 clerks of class 2; 40 clerks of class 1; 50 clerks, at $1,000 each; 115 clerks, at $900 each; 3 messengers; 10 assistant messengers; 5 laborers; 1 female laborer, $540; 3 female laborers, at $500 each; two charwomen; in all, $275,040.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a point of order to so much of this paragraph as provides for a superintendent at $3,000 and a supervisor at $2,750. I will suggest that the Chair is better informed on the postal law than myself. I make the point that these are new offices and that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Indiana anything to offer?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Has the gentleman from Tennessee anything to say?

Mr. SIMS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. He raises the point of order that it is new legislation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Section 169 of the Revised Statutes, second edition, 1878, provides that—

Each head of a department is authorized to employ in his department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees, and at such rate of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Here is a service established by law, and a force of clerks carried now on the rolls, paid from a lump sum appropriation on the Post-Office appropriation bill. Under the law we pick them up and appropriate for them on the legislative appropriation bill, fixing their salaries, as we are authorized to do, by recommendation from the head of the Department, under this section of the statute. And I will state to the chairman that we fixed the salaries at the same amount they were receiving and are now receiving under the other appropriation. The head of the Department, the Postmaster-General, has a right to fix their salaries under this section of the statute that I call attention to.

Mr. SIMS. I do not object to the office, but I make the point of order because I think the salaries are too high.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman if he could not arrange that by offering an amendment?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will suggest to the gentleman that I do not think a motion to reduce the salaries would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not press the point of order. It is known that the legislation is desirable, in order to maintain the efficiency of the service, and the Committee on Appropriations can usually be trusted on matters of this kind. The officers are under the civil service; and if this were presented as an independent proposition to the House, it would be likely to pass; and it would seem to me that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] could well withhold the point of order. If he desired to test the other matter by an amendment reducing the amount, that would be perfectly proper.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] will advocate an amendment making the salary $2,500 in one case and $2,000 in the other, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not want to accept any amendment at all. If the gentleman wants to offer an amendment and submit it to the House, I suppose he has that right, under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he thinks the law that he read applies to a superintendent or to any clerk outside of the classes regularly recognized—that is, classes 1, 2, 3, and 4?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think it does.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there not a separate law regulating the salaries of superintendents?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no law regulating the salaries of superintendents. I will state that the salaries carried on this bill for rural free delivery are followed where they are regulated by statute, and in cases where there is no statute fixing the salary the Postmaster-General fixes the salary himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman if the salary of the Superintendent of the Money-Order System is fixed by law or the superintendent of the free-delivery system or the Superintendent of the Dead-Letter Office?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The salary of the Superintendent of the Money-Order Division, I believe, is fixed by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not a matter of fact that all these offices that have a statutory existence are fixed by law and are fixed at the compensation referred to in the act?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I did not catch the Chair's question.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask the gentleman if the salaries of all these officials have not heretofore been fixed by a statutory law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think not. I think, Mr. Chairman, that most of them are fixed by an appropriation act, and in that way I think they are fixed by law, as I understand it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Practically all of them are fixed by an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is hardly inclined to hold that the fixing of a salary in an appropriation bill, or even the creation of an office in an appropriation bill, if it might have been there for an unlimited time, would be statutory law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, in my mind that all these places are in order on this bill. The question of the salary where it has not been fixed by statute is a question for the House to determine. I do not pretend but what a gentleman might offer an amendment reducing these salaries or increasing them because they happen to have been fixed on an appropriation bill heretofore. But certainly they are in order on this bill, and the salaries provided are in order on this bill, but if any member of the House seeks to change the salary by offering an amendment to make it less or make it more, I think the amendment would be in order. But this provision is not subject to the point of order, because these employees are properly carried in this bill and belong to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman think that an act creating the office of superintendent at a salary of $100,000 would not be subject to a point of order?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not think it would be subject to the point of order, but I think that the House would very promptly vote it off. I have no information myself as to whether these salaries are too high or too low. I am inclined to think that the salaries are fixed at about the right amount. They were fixed by the Postmaster-General, and they have been paid these salaries, and for that reason we take them up on this bill at the salaries heretofore fixed and paid out of the lump appropriation. If the House thinks the salaries are too high and a gentleman desires to offer an amendment reducing them, it is evidently not subject to the point of order, and the House can vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman if the salary of the superintendent of the free-delivery system is fixed by statute law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is fixed on a general appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman quite sure about that?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes, sir. The title was created on an appropriation bill a few years ago.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That was a new place, and it was fixed in an appropriation bill a few years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be clearly subject to a point of order if the office were created in an appropriation bill. That is a statutory law not created in an appropriation bill. It was created in a law authorizing the Postmaster-General to do it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It has not been so held heretofore by chairmen of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman cite the Chair to a ruling on that question?

Mr. CANNON. If the Chair pleases, I think this whole matter, as I understand it, comes under section 169 of the Revised Statutes. Has the Chair that section? It relates to clerks of class one, class two, class three, class four, copyists, messengers, and other employees.

Now, my recollection is that under that section we can supply such employees by appropriation, and are authorized to do so under the rule. It would be exceedingly difficult to run a public service without this section of the statute under the rules of the House. There is a series of sections, commencing with 161 and running down to 169, which reads as follows:

Each head of a department is authorized to employ in his department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Now, it seems to me that that would include a $2,000 employee or a $3,000 employee, and it was the very object, as I understand, of this legislation in section 169 of the Revised Statutes, that Congress is at liberty, without further legislation, to appropriate for such employees and at such salaries as Congress may provide.

Now, under our particular rules I do not think Congress could legislate and say there shall hereby be created an office of superintendent of mails whose salary shall be $3,000, because that creates something permanently, whereas this law contemplated that Congress should have the power without further legislation—and I think the rule was made, in view of this law, to supply the necessary help to carry on the departments—the only limitation being the discretion of the executive or head of department after Congress had made the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if in his opinion this section 169 is not to be construed in connection with the section which precedes, and that there is no salary in the preceding section exceeding $1,800?

Mr. CANNON. No, I think it is something further; because the Chair will see that the whole of title 4, down to and including section 169, refers to clerks and other officials in the Department. So that section 169 refers to all these that were not referred to in the preceding section, commencing with 161, and has placed these additional words:

and other employees, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Now, take section 167, the annual salaries of clerks and employees in the departments, whose compensation is not otherwise prescribed, shall be as follows:

Clerks of the fourth class, $1,800; clerks of the third class, $1,600; clerks of the second class, $1,400—and so on; then the women employees, and so on, to messengers. But the concluding section, 169, includes a reference to all of these, and goes further, and says—at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

So that, so far as the legislation is concerned, read in the light of the rule of the House, or rather the rule construed in the light of the legislation, in my judgment, it is quite competent for Congress to provide for any employee that it sees proper to provide for under the general legislation here enacted.

I think it is just as competent to provide for superintendent the coming year at $3,000 and stop there as it is to provide for the clerks of class 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois, if he were drawing this statute, if he would lay as much stress on the words "and other employees" coming, as they do, after "watchmen" and "laborers," as the gentleman seems to? Was that intended to include three and four thousand dollar employees? If the gentleman had been drawing the statute, would he have not placed that first?

Mr. CANNON. If it stopped there, the construction might be as the Chair intimates; but it does not. "And other employees, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress." Now, that is clearly an enlargement of the other sections; it is not only other employees than those especially detailed and referred to in the prior sections of the statute, but it goes on and says "and at such compensation." It seems to me the legislative grant there is plenary and it is a mere question of discretion under the law to appropriate for employees at any rate of compensation that Congress, in the exercise of its discretion under this law, may provide. And therefore a point of order does not lie in this case.

Now, if there were a statute—as there is—for instance, that fixed the salary of the Assistant Postmaster-General, it would not be in order to move to increase that salary beyond the statutory salary fixed by express law, because these sections would have to be construed in connection with that section.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest, further, that these people are now employed under the law, pursuant to the law, and for that reason are properly on this bill. As I said a while ago on the question of salary, an amendment seeking to change it is not subject to a point of order; but we are simply continuing in the public service men that are already in the public service, properly in the public service, and under the law authorizing their employment. The law carried on the post-office and post-roads bill authorizes, out of the sum appropriated, the employment of the force to carry on this business. They are employed now under the law, and so the continuation of their employment under this bill is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If gentlemen have nothing further to submit, the Chair is ready to rule. The Chair would hold that an appropriation bill may contain anything in relation to employees enumerated in these several sections; that is, clerks of classes one, two, three, and four may be employed, as well as messengers, assistant messengers, watchmen, and laborers, to such number as the Appropriations Committee may see fit to provide for.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Right there let me say——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will excuse the Chair for a moment. The Chair thinks the gentleman lays undue stress on language which evidently was not used in view of the creation of any division in the Post-Office Department. The Chair will now hear anything further that the gentleman from Indiana may wish to suggest.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I only wished to emphasize what has been said. Section 169 of the Revised Statutes provides:

Each head of a department is authorized to employ in his department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law—

Now, that is one thing—and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers—

Now, the statute does not stop there—and other employees.

If that language does not mean what it says, why is it used? Certain officers of the regular classified service are specified; and if they had been intended as the only officers to which the provision should apply the language would have stopped there. But the gentleman who drew this statute did not stop there; he went on and said:

And other employees, at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if it be the fact that this statute meant to include only those in the classified service—that is, classes 1, 2, 3, and 4, and messengers, etc.—what would be the use of this additional language? It would not mean anything. The gentleman who drew the statute, not stopping at that language, recognized that in the service there are many officers not within the classified list, and hence these words:

And other employees, at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

I do not lay so much stress upon that point, Mr. Chairman, as upon the point that these places are now in existence. They have been already created. In the bill appropriating for the free rural-delivery service, you authorized the Postmaster-General to employ such people in the city of Washington as may be necessary to carry out the intent of that appropriation. These people under that authorization were employed; they are now in the service; they are in office pursuant to law; and this provision does not propose to create any new place. It simply provides fixed salaries for places already created by law. So that as against these provisions the point of order can not be well taken.

As to the question of salary, I do not insist that these salaries can not be changed; they can be changed by proper amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no difficulty whatever in disposing of the strongest contention of the gentleman from Indiana—that these offices are authorized by law. They are authorized by law for the year; that is, for the life of the appropriation bill. As has been decided time and again by the courts, nothing contained in an appropriation bill can live beyond the life of the bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest to the Chair that this is the very point which the Chair passed on yesterday, where such employees had been authorized upon an appropriation bill for the present year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not determine the question to which the gentleman refers.

Now, the Chair recognizes the danger of overruling a point of order of this kind. Considerable stress might be laid upon the argument of the gentleman from Illinois in relation to the words "and other employees;" and that is all that could possibly influence the mind of the Chairman to overrule the point of order. But the Chair does not believe that it was the intent of the framers of the law, using, as they did, the words "and other employees, watchmen, and laborers," to empower the Appropriations Committee to create a new division in an executive department, with salaries beyond those provided for in sections 167 and 168. The Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order.

The point of order involves the superintendent, at $3,500, and the supervisor, at $2,750. If there be no objection, the Clerk will correct the totals of the paragraph.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office Second Assistant Postmaster-General: For Second Assistant Postmaster-General, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,100; superintendent of railway adjustments, $2,500; assistant superintendent of railway adjustments, $2,000; superintendent of foreign mails, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,000; chief of division of inspection, $2,000; chief of contract division, $2,000; chief of mail equipment division, $2,000; 9 clerks of class 4; 36 clerks of class 3; 25 clerks of class 2; stenographer, $1,600; 21 clerks of class 1; 17 clerks, at $1,000 each; 6 clerks, at $900 each; messenger in charge of mails, $900; 6 assistant messengers; in all, $184,820.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 8, page 131, after the word "thousand," strike out the words "one hundred" and insert "five hundred."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to increase the salary of the chief clerk of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General from $2,100 to $2,500.

The chief clerk in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General is now paid $2,500. The chief clerk in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, whose salary this amendment proposes to increase, is one of the most efficient officers in the Post-Office Department. He is in charge of the star-route service. In the absence of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General he is the Acting Assistant Postmaster-General. He occupies really the most responsible position of any chief clerk in the Post-Office Department, and his salary ought to he made at least equal to the salaries of officials of similar duties and less responsibility.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Did your committee recommend this increase of salary?

Mr. GRIGGS. The committee has taken no formal action on it, but the proposition has been discussed informally by 12 members of the committee, and they are unanimous in the opinion that the amendment ought to pass.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does that include the chairman of the committee?

Mr. GRIGGS. That includes the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HEMENWAY. In view of the fact that a majority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, including the chairman, want this salary increased, I do not feel disposed to make the point of order; but it can be made by any gentleman in the House who desires to make it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I hope no member will make it. This is a very deserving, hard-working man, and he ought to be put on all fours with some other men in the Post-Office Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman does not insist on the point of order. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to refer to page 118, line 20, under the head of the Postmaster-General, and to strike out the words "two hundred and fifty," in line 20, and insert the words "five hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent to refer to page 118, for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 20, page 118, strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I do this for the reason that I have received a letter from the Postmaster-General, in which he says he has appointed as private secretary a man who has been in his employment for many years, to whom he has paid $2,500 a year in private life. He asks this increase of $250, with the statement that he will have to pay it himself if Congress does not.

For that reason I offer the amendment for the consideration of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 103, line 11, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to page 103, line 11, for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. BARNEY. The amendment which I offer is to strike out the word "four," in line 11, and insert the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to recurring to this page for the purpose of offering an amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 103, line 11, strike out "four" and insert "five."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the total in the paragraph be corrected so as to conform to the amendment which has just been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will be authorized to correct the total.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CANNON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 256. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Tacoma, in the State of Washington;

S. 460. An act increasing the limit of cost of public building at Newport News, Va.;

S. 715. An act to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes;

S. 2782. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River by the Washington and Oregon Railway Company;

S. R. 51. Joint resolution to provide for the printing of 8,000 copies of the Annual Report of the Office of Experiment Stations, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1901; and

S. 2170. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a post-office building thereon at New York, borough of Manhattan, and State of New York.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9315) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Attorney-General to employ such assistant attorneys, agents, stenographers, and experts to aid the United States attorney for said court as may be necessary to conduct the business of the Court of Private Land Claims during the fiscal year 1902, $4,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 133, line 21, strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

Mr. HEMENWAY. It changes the date. That is all.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the term of temporary service of such additional clerks and other employees rendered necessary because of increased work incident to the war with Spain, and under the act of June 13, 1898, providing for war expenditures and for other purposes, appointed in the various departments of the Government, shall be extended for the term of one year from June 13, 1902, without compliance with the conditions prescribed by the act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service," approved January 16, 1883, provided they are otherwise competent.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3 by adding:

"Provided, That the President may at any time transfer clerks and other employees herein referred to to the classified service."

[Mr. LITTAUER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I say, Mr. Chairman, that if we are to make an employment agency out of the Government of the United States, the gentleman's amendment should become the law of the land. But, sir, if we are ever to retrench and reform, if we are ever to cut down the burdens caused by the Spanish war, we are making a very poor effort if this amendment should be adopted.

There is not a clerk in the employ of this Government, whose services are needed, who has a better friend than I have been since I have been in this House. I never turned a deaf ear to any of them or an unwilling hand to assist them; but the gentleman from New York confesses his case out of court, and I am trying to do my duty by my Government first.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman said that I said these clerks were upon the roll as temporary clerks because of the increase of work brought about by the war with Spain. I also stated that the heads of departments and bureaus where they are now at work have said unequivocally to us that their services are needed, and will be needed permanently, because of the increased work.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then why does not the gentleman bring in a regular bill? Why do you seek to put it on an appropriation bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. Because it is a fit place to put it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman confessed that it was subject to a point of order——

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If I had been a member of the committee and known it was subject to a point of order, I should have made it; but not being a member of the committee, not being familiar with the law in regard to this matter, I was not aware of the fact; and I asked the Chair if it was subject to a point of order, if there was any law permitting it, and the gentleman from New York said I was too late. As soon as I could offer the objection I asked the Chair——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the debate had proceeded for some time before the gentleman from Tennessee asked the Chair the question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York offered the amendment and debated it himself, possibly to cut off the point of order, and now undertakes to get behind his defenseless and sleeveless proposition. I am making no complaint of the Chair. I never made any complaint of the Chair, either as a chairman or as a member of this body.

I do say that there is no necessity for the passage of this amendment. It is not dealing fairly with the members of the House that the gentleman should seek to put new legislation on an appropriation bill; to state the proposition and immediately debate it, and then when I ask if the matter is objectionable, the gentleman to hide behind his defenseless and sleeveless cause. I could not be recognized with the gentleman standing on the floor, where he still stands defending the matter which I think is entirely without merit.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman who presented the amendment how many persons are to be affected by it, provided it should receive favorable consideration?

Mr. LITTAUER. I understand there are now in the War Department 600, and an appropriation is made in this bill for them of $600,000. In the Internal-Revenue Department there is an appropriation made of $550,000, and I suppose there are upward of 500 clerks to be affected.

In the Post-Office Department there are 22; in the Register's office of the Treasury Department there are 6; in the Auditor's office of the Navy Department there are 19; in the Auditor's office of the War Department there are 88, and in the Auditor's office of the Treasury Department 7. I would again state that the chiefs of each one of these bureaus stated that their services were necessary and will be necessary for the proper conduct of their offices.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before whom did they make that statement?

Mr. LITTAUER. They made it at the hearings to the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is the gentleman from New York a member of that committee?

Mr. LITTAUER. I am.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is anything said about this in the report accompanying the bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes; on page 2 of the report it reads as follows:

> It is proposed in the bill to continue for another year the temporary force of employees now in the Treasury, War, and Post-Office Departments, and whose services were, and are still, rendered necessary because of increased work incident to the war with Spain.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there any legislation permitting it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where is the law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In the bill. It was on the bill last year in exactly the same language.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why did the gentleman have to bring it in in this way if it is already in the bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. The amendment is not in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] to which gentleman he yields?

Mr. THAYER. To either.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Massachusetts had taken his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] has concluded his remarks, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] had read the report, he would not have charged that there has been unfairness on the part of the Appropriations Committee. We were just as explicit as we could be in that report in affirming that these temporary clerks are needed, and therefore they have been provided for in the bill. If the gentleman doubts the correctness of that position that they are needed, I will only mention one fact of which I presume he is cognizant. While over in the Philippines he doubtless learned the fact that we have now more than 400 military posts established in the Philippine Islands that did not exist four years ago.

Now, Mr. Chairman, since the Spanish war nobody has been sleeping. We state in our report, as we state now on the floor, that the result of the Spanish war and the treaty of Paris has given into our sovereign hands the control of the Philippine Islands. Nothing growing out of that war has decreased the work of the War Department or the Post-Office Department or the Navy Department. On the contrary, the work of those Departments has been increased immensely. That is what we say in the report. Hence we have reported an appropriation for these temporary clerks, not only for that reason, but for one other: Every head of a department or bureau that came before the subcommittee stated that they did not propose to exchange, or were not willing to exchange, these temporary clerks for an equal number selected from the specified service; that they wanted to retain these clerks, who have had experience and have become conversant with the work in hand. The heads of departments and chiefs of bureaus were not willing to exchange these clerks for the clerks of the classified service.

Now, if we should drop these temporary clerks we should have to authorize these bureaus and departments to take from the classified service an equal number of clerks. There would be no money saved, while at the same time you would lose the benefit of the experience and efficiency which these temporary clerks have acquired.

Mr. MADDOX. There is one point I should like to get at. The gentleman says that we ought not be surprised at the proposition made here, because it has been referred to in the report. Now, the report, as I understand, refers to this only as a temporary measure.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is correct, and we propose by this provision to make this a temporary force.

Mr. MADDOX. That is the point on which I wanted to hear the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. So far as the committee is concerned, we are not responsible for the amendment. But the amendment does not propose to put these clerks in the classified service at all. I might just as well say, without repeating exactly what happened in the committee, that the Appropriations Committee did not put in a clause providing for placing these temporary clerks in the classified service. We had the right to report such a provision; but it would have been subject to a point of order, and we did not do it. But here on the floor of the House a gentleman who happens to be a member of the Appropriations Committee and a member of the subcommittee proposes in his own right that the President shall have the power to put these clerks in the classified service. This House, of course, has the power by unanimous consent to change that proposition and provide for putting these clerks into the classified service without any help or suggestion from the President of the United States. That I would be in favor of doing; I would vote for such an amendment sooner than I would for this.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, when this temporary force was first created, which was done upon the legislative appropriation bill some years ago, I opposed the provision very vigorously. I thought then, and I think now, that this force might well have been drawn from the ordinary channels of the civil service. But we could not well deny the requests of the heads of the Executive Departments of the Government when they said that this temporary force was absolutely necessary to conduct the public business. So it was established as a temporary force, and has been continued from year to year in the legislative appropriation bills, the provision each year being subject to a point of order. It is therefore by the unanimous consent of the House that provision has been made for the temporary force each year up to the present time. The committee this year have reported a provision continuing that temporary force for one year longer.

It has been said to us from year to year that the growth of the Government work as the result of the Spanish war has been such that these temporary clerks would be needed permanently. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I have been reluctant to consent to the transfer of these clerks to the classified service; but I have become convinced that the best interests of the service require their transfer to the permanent classified force of the Government at this time.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am not interested in a single one of this force appointed under this temporary provision of the legislative bill. I made no recommendation for appointment under that temporary appropriation. I have no interest except that of the public service; but I believe the interest of the public service at this time will be best subserved by granting the unanimous request of every head of a Department in which this force exists. When that is done, there will no longer be in any Department a temporary force of this character, which gives rise to irritation and comparisons; and it is desirable, in the best interests of the Government service, that this should be suppressed forever. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York may prevail.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment:

Provided, That the President may at any time transfer the clerks and other employees herein referred to to the classified service.

That makes them permanent, as I understand.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It does, provided that the President is willing; but I should like to have that changed to say that he shall.

Mr. MADDOX. That he shall transfer them?

Mr. LITTAUER. I should like to state to the gentleman from Georgia that it does not make them permanent in the sense that those who are in the departments in the regular classified service now are. We shall have to appropriate for these clerks another year.

Mr. MADDOX. My point is that you are carrying an appropriation in this bill for these temporary clerks.

Mr. LITTAUER. For the temporary clerks.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is right.

Mr. MADDOX. And if I understand my colleague from Georgia, your committee did not consent to this amendment. My colleague said that the gentleman offered this amendment on his own volition, and that it does not come from the committee.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No.

Mr. MADDOX. And if I understand it, it does not meet the approval of the committee.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think if you would poll the Committee on Appropriations you would find we would vote unanimously to classify them. I am not authorized to speak for the other members of the committee, however.

Mr. MADDOX. I do not want to lecture the Committee on Appropriations, but I do want to say this: You gentlemen of that committee sit there, and when anybody proposes to offer an amendment, no matter what, that does not come from a member of the Committee on Appropriations, the very minute it is sent to the desk one of you gets up and says, "A point of order, Mr. Chairman."

Now here comes an amendment from a member of your committee, and it is offered, and immediately a gentleman begins to speak. No chance is given for the members on this floor to make a point of order. They say it has been debated, and therefore the point of order will not lie. Why, it has almost got to the point that nobody outside of the Committee on Appropriations can be heard about anything, or can make any point at all.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDOX. I want to say right here now, before this House, that there is no greater outrage, if I may characterize it in that way, that is perpetrated upon the House of Representatives than the method that you have of bringing in your appropriations, reporting a bill like this about this time in the evening. The next morning it is printed with the report. Nobody can get it before 11 o'clock.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman permit me, right there?

Mr. MADDOX. When the House meets, the bill is called up for consideration. Nobody has had an opportunity to read it; nobody knows anything about it except the committee themselves. Now, the bill may have a hundred different points of new legislation in it, and yet we do not know anything about it. These gentlemen know that these things are contrary to the rules of the House, but they do not say anything about them.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I correct the gentleman? I know my colleague does not want——

Mr. MADDOX. I believe that if we were to do these things as we ought to do them, every man ought to have an opportunity to examine these bills when they come in, and that we ought not to take up an appropriation bill, unless it be in a very great emergency, for at least three days after it is printed, so as to give every member of this House an opportunity to examine it. If this thing is to be left entirely to the Appropriations Committee, we had just as well allow them to bring in their bills and, without saying a word, have them passed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest to my colleague, the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. HEMENWAY], when the first point of order was made and discussed yesterday, right at the very incipiency of the whole transaction touching this measure, put the House on notice, and this is about his language: "There are many other increases in salaries in this bill that are subject to a point of order, if any gentleman wishes to make it."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Did anybody reserve points of order?

Mr. MADDOX. That is the difficulty; where are they?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You do the Committee on Appropriations entirely too much credit when you say they can come into this House with a bill and the whole House is blindfolded and knows nothing about the transactions of the Committee on Appropriations, that they can rush anything or jam anything through without your knowing anything——

Mr. MADDOX. This is my speech, and I want my time. [Laughter.] I want to say this, when the gentleman says that I do them too much——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to finish the sentence——

Mr. MADDOX (continuing). Credit. I want to say that every member knows the facts here. I do not care to discredit or to lecture, but here we find a member of your own committee who gets up and offers an amendment, supports it, and debates it, and as soon as some gentleman wants to make a point of order he is met with the cry that it is too late. If any other man gets up to offer an amendment, we find that the gentleman is standing watching his bill like a hawk, and objects; yet we find new legislation allowed to be offered in your bill, when you know it is wholly against the rules of the House. When you want to offer anything you jump up and begin to debate it without anybody knowing anything about it. That is the way this whole pocketbook and this whole concern is worked. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I want to suggest to the gentleman this, that whatever of merit or truth there may be in the gentleman's remarks they have no application at the present time, for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is clearly not subject to the point of order.

Mr. MADDOX. Why did he not give us the chance to make the objection, and have the Chair rule upon it, instead of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Has any member of the committee made the point of order, if the point of order could be made?

Mr. MADDOX. As soon as we found out what it was, my friend from Tennessee rose to make the point of order; but immediately he was informed he was too late, and by a member of the committee itself. The gentleman began to debate——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Withdraw the objection to the point of order and let us see if it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia, in a running statement here——

Mr. MADDOX. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that we are reducing our Army right along——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will ask the Chair if the time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired?

Mr. MADDOX (continuing). And at the same time here is a proposition to increase the salaries in the War Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought the gentleman from Georgia had taken his seat, and had recognized the gentleman from Indiana; but the Chair was mistaken, and corrects his mistake.

Mr. MADDOX. I was just simply saying——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I understood that the gentleman from Georgia had taken his seat and yielded the floor.

Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman knows as well as I do that I have the floor.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Very well, then; I will take the floor in my own right.

Mr. MADDOX. I just wanted to say that you are adding about 600 clerks to the War Department.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to say to the gentleman that he is wholly mistaken.

Mr. MADDOX. Wait until I get through.

Mr. HEMENWAY. All right.

Mr. MADDOX. We are going to have peace, according to Governor Taft, and we will need only about 15,000 troops in the Philippine Islands. Now, in that case, what is the necessity for these 600 additional clerks in the War Department in addition to what they had before the war? Now, what is the business that makes it necessary to have them? I asked that question of the gentleman and I will yield the floor to him to answer.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not desire to have the gentleman yield the floor to me. I want it in my own right when I can get it.

Mr. MADDOX. All right.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to say that the gentleman, with intention or without intention, has misstated the position of the Committee on Appropriations. He says we can bring into this House bills and shove them through here without anyone having opportunity to know what these bills contain.

Mr. MADDOX. Well, will you allow me to ask you a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I deny it.

Mr. MADDOX. Did not you report this bill to the House the day before yesterday about this time?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We reported the bill, certainly.

Mr. MADDOX. Do you not know that it was not printed until 11 o'clock the following day, and it was a bill of about 150 pages; and do you not know that it is impossible for gentlemen to know what it contains?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman allow me to answer?

Mr. MADDOX (continuing). And you brought it up here for consideration the next day.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman allow me to answer him? The gentleman knows that this bill was where every member of the House could get it at 9 o'clock, and with the bill is a report, covering only 10 pages, that any man who has the intelligence that a page ought to have to be on this floor could go over in fifteen minutes and ascertain every change that is in the bill. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the report, under the head of House of Representatives, every change made in the current law is given; next, under the head of Library of Congress, every change made in the current law; next, under the head of Executive Office, every change made in current law; next in the Department of State.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there anything stated in this report about this?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I decline to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there anything about this?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Every change made in the current law is here distinctly stated in the report, covering only 11 pages; and, as I say, anyone with the intelligence of a page upon the floor could read this report in five minutes and determine every change which is made in this appropriation bill that carries 135 pages.

I call the attention of the gentleman further to the report here where every limitation to an appropriation is set out. Everywhere that we seek to change the current law by the change of a single word it is set out. In my statement to the House yesterday I called attention to two little items that by oversight did not get into the report; one was an increase of $60 in a salary, and the other was an increase of $100 in the expenses for public buildings and grounds.

Now, then, as to the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, that the Committee on Appropriations bring in bills here covering many pages and shove them through when people do not know what is in them, there is absolutely nothing in it, because every change is pointed out in the report.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the gentleman recognize that when a bill is printed and ready for distribution at 9 o'clock in the morning, the members of the House may have other business to attend to; that they have to attend committee meetings and to other business?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call the gentleman's attention to my opening statement yesterday morning, in which I pointed out to members of the House that there was a report, and that the members could secure the report at the desk, and that in this report, which is very short and very simple, every change in the current law is mentioned.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But that was after the bill was brought up.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It was at the opening of the general discussion. The general debate continued for some time after that. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] occupied the time of the House for nearly an hour, and other gentlemen could have had time if they wished it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the gentleman recognize that if we read the reports it would take some time to impress it on our minds and consider whether it would be wise or unwise; that it takes time to consider these matters?

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will take the report and read it, and will say that he does not understand the bill——

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is not a question of understanding; it is a question whether or not it is wise or unwise that this change should be made. In some instances I think they should be made.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Would the gentleman from Colorado suggest that an appropriation bill should be brought in here and reported and then lie ten days before it is taken up?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; but at least twenty-four hours should elapse after the printing of the report.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Twenty-four hours did elapse after the printing of the report. The bill was reported Wednesday morning and it was not taken up until Thursday morning.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We got the printed report on the same day that it was taken up.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It was printed on Wednesday and the bill came up on Thursday.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It was taken up Thursday morning, and that was the time we got the report.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Twenty-four hours elapsed between the report of the bill and the time it was taken up, and here is the report that states every change of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I must yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON], who first rose.

Mr. NORTON. Suppose we had all read that report, what is there contained in it that would have given us any information that the gentleman from New York was about to offer an amendment?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Absolutely nothing. On the other hand, what information can a committee give in any report that will foretell what any member may offer by way of amendment? Any gentleman here could have made a point of order. Every member has an equal right and power to make a point of order against this provision in the bill. As for myself, I want to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that this whole provision of a temporary force that has been carried for three or four years on these appropriation bills has been subject to a point of order. It is in violation of law. The law is that clerks shall be appointed through the civil service, but at the time the force was provided for we hoped that in a short time there would be no further necessity for that force.

Consequently the appropriation is temporary; but as time ran on the chiefs of divisions insisted that they needed the force, and insisted that they could not get along without it. They say it is a better force than the force they could get through the civil service, and they asked the committee to put these clerks under the civil service.

Now, I called attention in my statement yesterday to this matter. I said:

> The question of temporary clerks now in the different departments of the Government is taken up on this bill. When this temporary force was granted, the Committee on Appropriations believed that their services would not be necessary for any great length of time.
> We find, however, that the services of this temporary force are absolutely necessary to conduct the business of the several departments; and, in fact, in some of the departments they insist that they not only need all the temporary force, but an additional force. There is only one department where a recommendation is submitted to decrease that force. That is the War Department, where they submit a decrease of only $5,000 in the total appropriation of $600,000. Many of the departments have insisted that this force ought to be covered into the civil service; but as we do not legislate on appropriation bills, no legislation in that regard is placed upon this bill, and the force is carried as a temporary force for another year.

I called the attention of the House to the fact that many were insisting that this force ought to go under civil service. Now, the gentleman from New York offered this amendment. No point of order was made. I believe it was good legislation; and by the unanimous consent of the House——

Mr. MADDOX. Let me ask the gentleman a question: Has he investigated this matter himself so as to be able to say whether these clerks are needed or not?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have.

Mr. MADDOX. Does the gentleman state as his belief that they are needed; that they are necessary for the service?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do. There is absolutely no doubt about it.

Mr. MADDOX. Did you do that before the bill was made up?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MADDOX. Then why did you not put it in the bill, for it is a change of law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, this House has the power——

Mr. MADDOX. Have you not, according to your own statement, changed the law time and again on this bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have changed it—by unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDOX. Then why did you not change it in this case, if you thought it necessary?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call the gentleman's attention to this fact: We can not change one line of law on this bill without his consent. We can not change one line of law on this bill without the consent of every member of this House who is in his seat performing his duty; because every line of change that may be proposed is subject to a point of order, and any man on this floor has power to make such a point.

Mr. SHAFROTH. May I ask this question: Is not the wisdom of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York dependent to a large extent upon the question whether the army in the Philippines shall be reduced to 15,000 or whether it shall be 40,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not propose to go into that proposition, but to confine myself to the question before the House.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will not more clerks be needed in the event——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I decline to go into the question of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow an interruption——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not care to be interrupted; I want to discuss the question before the House for a few moments before my time expires.

The provision in the bill for this temporary force was subject to a point of order and has at all times been subject to such a point. No point was made against it; and when it was received without any point of order being made, it was subject to an amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from New York which was then offered is not out of order, and would not have been subject to a point of order if such a point had been made by any member of the House. The original provision itself was subject to such a point, but no point was made; and the gentleman from New York had the right to do what he did—to offer an amendment to the original provision.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me a single suggestion? The gentleman, as I understood him, in his opening statement on this floor, called attention to this provision of the bill, and said that there was no provision in the bill which would make this a permanent force or would authorize the President to cover it into the classified service.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I did not use the words "permanent force." As long as this force is needed it is as much a permanent force as the force under the civil service. The idea that the force covered by the civil service is a permanent force is erroneous. The members of that force may be discharged whenever their services are unnecessary.

Mr. MANN. I made a clear distinction between a permanent force and the force under the classified service. The gentleman, as I understood, did say that there was nothing whatever in this bill which would carry these employees beyond the fiscal year for which this appropriation is being made.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And there is nothing of that kind in it. If this amendment is adopted, there is nothing of that kind in it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman made the statement also that there was nothing in the bill which would authorize the President to cover these clerks into the classified service.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Now, a member of the House who might have been perfectly willing not to have made a point of order upon paying these temporary clerks for but a year might have clearly desired to make a point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. Does the gentleman from Indiana think it was fair to the House or the Committee of the Whole——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Let me answer one question at a time.

Mr. MANN. I have not asked my question yet.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I thought you had, at least one question; and now you are asking another—whether I think it fair to do something. Let me answer your first question.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JENKINS. As a substitute for the pending amendment, I offer the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the President may at any time during the fiscal year 1903 transfer all such additional clerks and other employees herein referred to to the classified service.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. I think I am in time this time.

Mr. JENKINS. I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. With the consent of the gentleman, I move to strike out "1903" and to make it read "1902 or 1903."

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on that, Mr. Chairman, until we know what the amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] has the floor. No other gentleman can offer an amendment while the gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor. Points of order are reserved on this amendment. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, before discussing the amendment offered by myself as a substitute to the pending amendment I desire to say to the gentleman from Georgia that I am very willing, as far as I am concerned, to agree to the amendment that he suggests. My substitute is a little broader than the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER]. I am in full sympathy with the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and I propose to support it; but the difference between the two amendments is this, Mr. Chairman: Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York it is optional with the President to place one or more of the clerks now on the temporary roll on the permanent roll or in the classified service.

Under the substitute that I have offered it is not discretionary with the President to place any one, less than the whole, on the classified roll. I think there should be no favoritism, and that inasmuch as the War Department tells us that it needs the services of every one of these clerks, and that they are competent, they should all be transferred to the permanent roll, and in this way relieve the War Department from the embarrassment that must grow up from the necessity of deciding between those who should go on the permanent roll and those who should remain on the temporary roll.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by inserting "nineteen hundred and two or nineteen hundred and three."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the point of order ought either to be insisted upon or withdrawn before we go much further in amending this proposition before the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask, then, for the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee raise the point of order?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I raise the point of order, Mr. Chairman, and I want to submit, first, that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], should read his own speech, which is found in the RECORD, on page 1450, where he said that the reason why this amendment was not put in the bill was because they could not legislate in this bill. Here is his language:

Many of the departments have insisted that this force ought to be covered into the civil service, but as we do not legislate on appropriation bills, no legislation in that regard is placed upon this bill, and the force is carried as a temporary force for another year.

The gentleman has just read this, and yet failed to make the point of order, although he knew the amendment was subject to it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], with his usual candor and frankness, says this amendment is even broader than the one that it proposes to amend. That is his language. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], in other words, confesses that this matter is new legislation, and that the bill itself provides for the temporary force for another year, to remain as a "temporary force." It should be kept, if at all, "temporary."

Mr. Chairman, I say in all candor that the war with Spain has ended, and that now we only have it in the Philippines, and that has been ended several times, as we have been officially informed, and yet this amendment, which the committee itself, who report this bill, dare not bring in, is offered here in this way, and they dare not make a point of order against it. They knew it was subject to a point of order, and yet not one of that committee raised the point of order, nor did the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] give us a chance to raise it here. Certainly it was the duty of the committee to deal more frankly and openly in this matter. We have little chance to know when the bill carries new legislation and when it does not, unless the committee familiar with the bill explain it. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is new legislation, and bad legislation at that. Let the clerks, if retained at all, be retained as temporary.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What point of order is now pending, and to what amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is pending against the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. But no point of order is pending against the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER]?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. THAYER. No; I want to make an inquiry of the committee. I am rather in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], but there is one thing which I do not fully comprehend.

I understand there are now some 500 clerks in the War Department on the temporary list, and his amendment here will make those permanent. If they have been retained there three years under this temporary provision, why can you not retain them right along another year in the same way? Why are we obliged now to make the change?

Mr. LITTAUER. Only to make them permanent, in the sense that they would be under the provisions of what we call the civil-service law.

Mr. THAYER. I understand that.

[Mr. LITTAUER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take occasion to say that if the original amendment was before the Chair with a point of order pending it would require all the eloquence of the distinguished gentleman from New York to disabuse the mind of the Chair of some prejudice that he might have against that amendment.

The Chair is quite clear that if the point had been raised that the Chair would have sustained it against the original amendment. The Chair can not be responsible for the negligence of members of the House who sleep on their rights.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who were outraged by other members of the House on this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute being in the opinion of the Chair substantially the same as the amendment itself, the Chair overrules the point of order, and the question is on the substitute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Has that substitute ever been read to the House?

Mr. MANN. Pending the question of the ruling of the Chair, my understanding was that they accepted the amendment to the substitute, making it apply to the present fiscal year.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am ready to offer that, if I have an opportunity. I move to amend the substitute, making it 1902 or 1903.

Mr. MANN. I raise the point of order upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "year" the words "1902 or," so as to read "during the fiscal year 1902 or 1903."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute as offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The substitute offered by Mr. JENKINS, as proposed to be amended by Mr. LIVINGSTON, was read.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I desire to make the inquiry, is that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin plus the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia?

The CHAIRMAN. That includes the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, I wanted to hear the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute as offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and will also report the amendment to the substitute, offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The substitute offered by Mr. JENKINS, and the amendment to the substitute, offered by Mr. LIVINGSTON, were again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia to the substitute.

[Mr. LITTAUER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. JENKINS. My amendment proposes to put them all in and remove all chance of favoritism. The amendment of the gentleman from New York places it in the discretion of the President to put in one or more when he sees fit. Every one of the clerks is meritorious and every one competent. Inasmuch as the Department says they need them, I do not know why the amendment should not be adopted, so as to transfer them all and not give an opportunity to select favorites and exclude those who are just as much entitled to recognition for their services as others.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York may be again read. It was read under such circumstances that many members of the committee did not understand its provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The difference between the two propositions is this: The gentleman from New York gives discretionary power to the President to do what he chooses, and exercise a great deal of partiality, if he desires to do so. He can put in ten and stop there, or put in a hundred and stop there, or he can pick them out and put them in and leave others out. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin authorizes him to put them all in or none—that is the difference.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And a great deal of difference, too.

The amendment to the substitute offered by Mr. JENKINS was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SHAFROTH) there were—ayes 77, noes 39.

So the amendment to the amendment by way of substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SHAFROTH and Mr. GAINES of Tennessee) there were—ayes 81, noes 56.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I call for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. LITTAUER and Mr. SHAFROTH.

The question was again taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 61.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the committee and the chairman of the subcommittee, I ask to return to page 15 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I desire to reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be reported before consent is asked to return to the paragraph. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 13, page 15, after the word "Affairs," insert the words "and the Judiciary." In line 14 strike out "one thousand four hundred and fifty-two" and insert "two thousand one hundred and seventy-eight."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to recurring to the paragraph for the purpose of offering the amendment?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the amendment about?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What does this amendment relate to?

Mr. RAY of New York. I will explain.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, first, Will the committee consent to return to the paragraph?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will not consent, Mr. Chairman, until I know what the amendment relates to.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, the matter of assistant clerks for three committees was referred to the Committee on Accounts, and that committee has recommended that they be allowed. This includes an assistant clerk for the Committee on the Judiciary. I did not go to the Committee on Appropriations with the matter, but it seems that the other two committees did, and the allowance of compensation for the clerks was put into the appropriation bill. I was not in when that clause of the bill was read, and I simply ask to go back for the purpose of having a provision for the assistant clerk of the Judiciary Committee inserted in the bill, with those of the other committees. This is but just and proper, and carries out the recommendation of the Committee on Accounts. The Committee on Accounts reported the three committees together——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is this new legislation? Does it change existing law?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, I think not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What does the committee want with two clerks? The committee has not reported any business this session.

Mr. RAY of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon. We reported five bills this morning, and we have reported a great many heretofore. We shall report many more. We certainly need this clerk.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many clerks have you had heretofore?

Mr. RAY of New York. We had this assistant clerk in the last Congress; but we have not had one during the present Congress. In order to have one, it is necessary to get authority for it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does this provision make this clerk an annual clerk?

Mr. RAY of New York. No; just for the session.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And this is nothing more than you asked for last year?

Mr. RAY of New York. Nothing more than we asked for and had in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And the salary is the same?

Mr. RAY of New York. There is no salary, but a per diem—$6 a day for the session. The amendment proposes to give us only just what we have had and what we need now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How did you get left out in this matter, anyway?

Mr. RAY of New York. I went before the Committee on Accounts and the proposition was recommended by them. I did not go to the Committee on Appropriations. I suppose I was negligent in not going there, but I was busy in the committee room. When this item was passed in the pending bill I was not in the House, but busy in committee.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to state that some time ago the Committee on Accounts made a report covering this clerk, with others.

Mr. RAY of New York. They reported in favor of these three clerks. These other two clerks for Committee on Military and Naval Affairs were inserted in the bill, but not the clerk for our committee, because I suppose I did not go before the committee.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman said he went before the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. RAY of New York. I did go before the Committee on Accounts, but not before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANN. What was the report of the Committee on Accounts on your matter?

Mr. RAY of New York, They reported in favor of this clerk as well as the clerks of the other two committees.

Mr. MANN. We had before the House some time ago a report from the Committee on Accounts, which was adopted by the House and which was understood to cover everything of this kind.

Mr. RAY of New York. Since that time we went before the Committee on Accounts and they have reported in favor of clerks for these three committees. The Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Military Affairs made application to the Appropriations Committee to have their additional clerks provided for in this bill, and they were put in. But I did not think of going and did not go before that committee in behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I was busy in the committee room the other day when this item was passed in the present bill, so that this request was not made at that time.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a further question? As I understand from the gentleman's explanation, the Committee on Accounts made a report recommending an additional clerk for his committee, as well as for the Naval Committee, and what other committee?

Mr. RAY of New York. The Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MANN. And that was in the report which the Committee on Accounts submitted to the House?

Mr. RAY of New York. It is now included in the report of the Committee on Accounts, but has never been acted on by the House.

Mr. MANN. Did not the House strike out the provision for those three committees?

Mr. RAY of New York. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. What was done with that report?

Mr. RAY of New York. The report is now pending in the House, but has not been called up or acted on.

Mr. MANN. I remember very distinctly that the House struck out a provision for the Naval Committee.

Mr. RAY of New York. If the gentleman will turn to page 15 of this bill, he will find the following provision:

For an assistant clerk to each of the Committees on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs, at $6 per day each during the session, $1,452.

Those two committees and the Committee on the Judiciary were reported together from the Committee on Accounts favorably. The House has not acted upon the matter at all—upon the report of the Committee on Accounts; it is still pending in the House. But gentlemen representing two of these committees went to the Committee on Appropriations. I did not go; I did not think of it. And I was not in the House when we passed over this item I have just read, which has been already adopted by the House. I was in my committee room at the time. If I had been here I should have brought this proposition up. All three committees were treated alike by the Committee on Accounts. Here is a member of that committee who will confirm what I will say.

Mr. HUGHES. The gentleman from New York, representing the Judiciary Committee, came before the Committee on Accounts, and this additional clerk was allowed to that committee; but because the chairman of the Judiciary Committee failed to go before the Committee on Appropriations and have a provision inserted in this bill the matter was not attended to. That was simply an oversight on his part.

Mr. MANN. Was not this proposition originally reported from the Committee on Accounts and voted down by the House?

Mr. HUGHES. No, sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We have not been able to hear the explanation of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]; and therefore, in the absence of information about this proposition, I object to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the gentleman in charge of this bill, I desire to offer an amendment, to come in at the end of line 8, page 49. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That for the fiscal year of 1902 and thereafter a full and complete list of all officers, agents, clerks, and other employees of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, including bank examiners, receivers, and attorneys for receivers, and clerks employed by such examiners and receivers, or any other person connected with the work of said office, in Washington or elsewhere, whose salaries or compensation is paid from the Treasury of the United States or assessed against or collected from existing or failed banks under their supervision or control, shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress, approved January 12, 1805, relating to the official register: And provided further, That the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby directed to include in his annual report to the Speaker of the House of Representatives expenses incurred during each year in liquidation of each failed national bank separately.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will reserve the question of objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I reserve an objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will withdraw the objection if the gentleman wishes to make some explanation—if we can get order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order, please. The gentlemen will not proceed until the committee is in order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I made no objection to returning to this point, for the reason that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] seeks to cure an abuse in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency. We have ascertained that in that office men have been employed who are not carried upon any appropriation bill and are not mentioned in any report from that office to Congress, and that extravagant salaries have been paid. For instance, a receiver at $7,000 a year has been provided for there and one at $5,000 a year is now provided for there.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who did that?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And there is no law for it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. With a force of clerks under them. They also have employed a gentleman at $25 per day, with a force of clerks under him. The money to pay this force of clerks has been secured from failing banks. They have been assessed, and in that way the money secured by which these two separate sets of clerks in the city of Washington and, as I understand it, three clerks in the city of Chicago are paid.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to know if the purpose of this amendment is solely to furnish Congress with information as to what is being done in that office.

Mr. HILL. That is all.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The purpose of this amendment is to prohibit such a state of affairs in the future, and to require a report of the number of people employed out of this fund, and the salaries paid. That is the sole purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What bill has been carrying the appropriation for these salaries heretofore?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There has been no appropriation carried for these salaries on any appropriation bill. These people have been paid out of moneys collected from failing banks that were in the hands of receivers.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I see no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me there ought not to be any objection to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I insist upon it until I have heard from the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this proposition ought to carry itself. I have before me the Official Register, with the law, and as I read it every employee of the United States Government, his name, residence, salary, and so forth, should be found in it. I believe that refers just as much to a national-bank examiner who is appointed by the Comptroller, and who collects his money from the banks at a specified fee fixed by law, as to the Comptroller who appoints him. But no such report has been made recently, and the information can not be found in the Official Register. The amendment proposes that the names of all appointees of the United States Government who receive compensation or emolument shall, as provided in the act of January 12, 1889, be found in that register.

And in addition to that it provides that the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, which is made to the Speaker of the House of Representatives every year, shall contain the expenses of the liquidation of each bank separately. I do not believe it is right that the creditors of a defunct national bank should have their money taken for expenses without knowing how much is taken; and that is all the amendment calls for. It is not a change of existing law in any sense. I do not believe that it is subject to the point of order, and if it was, I do not believe there is a man on this floor who would want to make it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It only calls for a report, does it not?

Mr. HILL. That is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Does it apply to anything except the Comptroller's office?

Mr. HILL. I do not know of any other department of the Government where this practice exists, because I know of no other department of the Government where officials are paid by assessments upon defunct institutions. If there were any such, I should include it in the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The reason I ask is because I have been trying to get some information about the Revenue-Cutter Service, and they do not publish in the Blue Book or the Official Register the names of any of the employees.

Mr. HILL. Then I trust the gentleman will offer a similar amendment when that matter comes up on the proper appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's statement covered both, and I asked whether his amendment covers them both.

Mr. HILL. It simply covers a matter that I know about.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The purpose of this is first to get a report.

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, this is the report from the Comptroller of the Treasury, showing the number of officers, who they are, what they have been paid, who have been appointed to do the work, have done the work, and been paid when there is no work to do.

Mr. HILL. Oh, no.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not that the fact?

Mr. HILL. Oh, no; this is the report for this year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It shows just how little we can hear over here. It is almost impossible to hear. Now I withdraw my objection, having obtained that information.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I present the following amendment to the amendment. I think it will be accepted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to reserve the point of order upon the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That hereafter there shall not be paid to any person employed by or under the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, from funds belonging to insolvent national banks, compensation exceeding at the rate of $4,000 per annum.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I insist upon the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. What point of order does the gentleman raise?

Mr. MANN. That is purely new legislation, Mr. Chairman—a change of existing law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The amendment had no point of order on it, and therefore an amendment to the amendment is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I also make the point of order that it is not germane to the amendment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Chair is in doubt, I want to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be pleased to hear the gentleman from Indiana at the same time he is looking this over.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut seeks to prohibit the paying of salaries out of this fund collected from failing national banks. There has heretofore been paid out of this fund salaries of $7,000 a year, of $25 a day, and $5,000 per year, and so on. Now, my amendment seeks to limit the amount of salary that can be paid to any one person out of this fund to which the gentleman's amendment refers.

Mr. MANN. Are you aware of any payment in excess of $4,000?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. What is it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Here is a rate of compensation to one gentleman of $25 a day, and here is another rate of compensation to another gentleman of $7,000 a year, and a rate of compensation to another of $5,000 a year.

Mr. CANDLER. By what authority of law have these salaries been paid?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not believe myself there is any authority of law for the payment of these salaries. They are brought up in this way: When a national bank fails, it is placed in the hands of a receiver. Now, it is claimed by the Comptroller that when these banks get to the point when the receiver is discharged, then their business is finally wound up in the city of Washington here in these two departments. Now, at the head of one of these departments is an expert receiving $25 a day, and at the head of another is an expert receiving $7,000 a year, and they get their salaries by an assessment upon these banks that have failed.

Mr. MANN. This provision would apply to all receivers of national banks anywhere?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Take, for instance, a national bank of Chicago which failed a few years ago with assets of $10,000,000. The gentleman would limit this so as to apply only to the force employed here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear what is going on. It is impossible to do so unless the committee be in order.

Mr. MANN. I understand the force in Washington are appointed as a temporary receiver of the bank?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no; it would not affect the receiver.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will not proceed any further with business until it comes to order. The Chair is absolutely unable to hear what is said by gentlemen discussing this point of order.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if this bill itself carries the appropriation out of which these salaries were paid, it is probable that the point of order would not lie and the appropriation might be limited in the payment of salaries; but this bill has nothing to do with the money out of which these salaries are paid. This is clearly an act of legislation, and while the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut has been subject to a point of order, and that point of order having been waived, it would not make this amendment not subject to a point of order, because this is clearly additional legislation; not a restriction upon the money appropriated, but a clear act of new legislation, which always changes existing law. This amendment is not germane to the amendment, because the original amendment had no contemplation——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman think the amendment to the amendment is a limitation upon the subject-matter of the amendment?

Mr. MANN. No. Of course, like the gentleman from Mississippi, my knowledge of the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut is from the gentleman's own statement. His statement was that this merely called for a report. Now, here is a proposition to fix the salary.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut calls for a report. The amendment is that in making the report there shall be no salary above a certain amount.

Mr. MANN. No; there shall be no salary paid above a certain amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has no hesitation in saying that the amendment is not germane to the amendment now before the committee. It is on a different subject-matter. The question is on the adoption of the amendment before the committee.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to recur to pages 14 and 15 for the purpose of offering two innocent amendments, and to say that at the time these two paragraphs were read, for a short time, I was absent on account of the serious illness of a friend, and could not be present to offer the amendments at that time.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I am constrained to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of section 4. I do it for the purpose, among other things, of inquiring of the gentleman from Indiana what authority decides the question that may be raised under this section as to the competency and capacity of the clerks in the Treasury and other public offices?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to a provision that has been carried on the bill for some time that—

The appropriation herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons permanently incapacitated for performing such service.

Now, we have struck out the words "permanently incapacitated" and say "incompetent or incapacitated," the object being this, if the gentleman desires to know: We have had considerable trouble in inducing the heads of departments to discharge incompetent clerks, and when the question is put, "Why don't you discharge them?" they say, "Well, your provision states that they must be permanently incapacitated." So we strike out the word "permanently" and say "incompetent or incapacitated."

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman's answer has satisfied me pretty well on that subject. But I have a letter, Mr. Chairman, from a constituent that has given me a good deal of anxiety today, and I want to call the attention of the House of Representatives, sitting in Committee of the Whole, to what I deem a very important question. I had not thought of it until my constituent wrote to me, and he writes me a series of interrogatories of this character. He has discovered, what I had not discovered before until the letter called my attention to it, that the system of rural free delivery that we have heard something about has been placed under the civil-service law of the country, and competitive examinations, academic and otherwise, are to be held for the selection of these important personages who carry the mail.

The wording of the order is of such a broad character that my constituent is worried about this view of it. He says the system, according to his understanding of the language or something similar to that, is made up of three general grand divisions—first, the man himself; second, the horse; and, third, the wagon. [Laughter.]

Now, he desires to know this, Will these competitive examinations that are to be carried on, as I understand it by a board of distinguished scientists—veterinary surgeons, blacksmiths, and wagon makers [laughter]—will that examination be in gross or in detail? Will there be one concern, one aggregation of man, horse, and wagon, or will there be three several component parts, each of which must stand upon its own merit? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Of course, this is a merit system. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is of the highest importance, and the merit system is coming squarely into action. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have tried for a long time to bring this matter to the consideration of the Department, but have encountered the same difficulty that the gentleman has.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Department has got me into this trouble, and I am seeking some method of getting out of it.

There is just as much necessity for a meritorious wagon as there is for a meritorious man; and surely nobody will deny that a meritorious horse is an imperative necessity in this case.

A MEMBER. And harness, too.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The issue was presented to me in this form: Suppose now that in this competitive examination a competitor, A, should rank No. 1 under the man examination; but A's horse is away down at the foot, and the wagon somewhere between. What is to happen? [Laughter.] It seems to me there ought to be a provision that when the man comes into competition, he surrenders himself and his horse and his wagon to the judgement of these scientists, and if A should be selected as the carrier, B must surrender his right to the horse, if his horse is of the best character; and the wagon must take the same course.

Now, I submit to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service that there ought to be a clear definition sent to the people of the country, advising them where the merit system applies and which is the dominating factor—the man, or the horse, or the wagon. [Laughter.] Which factor is to control in making up this report? It is a matter of magnificent importance, and the whole system is threatened with overthrow on this very ground. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. As I do not see present the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and as I am a member of that distinguished committee, I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether there is anything in the merit system that recognizes increased merit by reason of length of service of the wagon or of the horse.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is another trouble.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. How about the "veteran" horse?

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOUD reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10847) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that the amendments be concurred in and the bill as amended passed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] In the absence of such a demand, the Chair will put the question on the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MONONGAHELA RIVER.

Mr. DALZELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 5801) to authorize the St. Clair Terminal Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, was read, with the amendments of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES COURT AT CATLETTSBURG, KY.

Mr. KEHOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 10070, as amended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report to the House.

The bill (H. R. 10070) establishing a United States court at Catlettsburg, in the eastern district of Kentucky, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of "An act to divide Kentucky into two judicial districts," approved February 12, 1901, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows: Insert immediately after the word "year," in next to last line of said section, the words "at Catlettsburg, beginning on the fourth Monday in May and the second Monday in December in each year."

Mr. KEHOE. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment which is found on the last page of the report.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "amended," in line 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 9. That the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Kentucky shall be held at the following times and places, namely: At Louisville, beginning on the second Monday in March and the second Monday in October in each year; at Owensboro, beginning on the fourth Monday in November and the first Monday in May in each year; at Paducah, beginning on the third Monday in April and the third Monday in November in each year; at Bowling Green, beginning on the third Monday in May and the second Monday in December in each year.

"That the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Kentucky shall be held at the following times and places, namely: At Frankfort, beginning on the second Monday in March and the fourth Monday in September in each year; at Covington, beginning on the first Monday in April and the third Monday in October in each year; at Richmond, beginning on the fourth Monday in April and the second Monday in November in each year; at London, beginning on the second Monday in May and the fourth Monday in November in each year; at Catlettsburg, beginning on the fourth Monday in May and the second Monday in December in each year, and at such other times and places as may hereafter be provided by law."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman how many additional places this makes for the holding of court?

Mr. KEHOE. One, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Only one?

Mr. KEHOE. Only one—at Catlettsburg.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose there is a court-house there now, is there, or a Government building?

Mr. KEHOE. I do not know, sir. There is no Federal court held within 150 miles, nor any within two Congressional districts, containing a population of 450,000 people.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not quite adjusted to the phraseology of the bill; but, without objection, the Clerk will be permitted to correct that.

Mr. KEHOE. Let it be adjusted to the phraseology of the bill. That was the purpose of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KEHOE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SETTLERS IN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3084) for the relief of bona fide settlers in forest reserves.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

LIGHT STATION ON BLUFF SHOAL, PAMLICO SOUND, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 199) for the establishment of a light station on Bluff Shoal, Pamlico Sound, North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read.

The following amendment, recommended by the committee, was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the following in lieu thereof:

"That there be established a light station on or near Bluff Shoal, Pamlico Sound, North Carolina, the cost of which shall not exceed $30,000.

"SEC. 2. That the act approved March 3, 1901, for rebuilding the light station on Northwest Point Royal Shoal, North Carolina, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like an explanation of the purpose of the bill. As I understand from the reading of the bill, Congress formerly appropriated for this object.

Mr. SMALL. That is correct.

Mr. PAYNE. For what reason was it not built in time?

Mr. SMALL. At the last session of Congress an appropriation of $30,000 was made in the sundry civil bill for the rebuilding of the light station on Northwest Point Royal Shoal, a station that had existed there for a great many years. Since that time the Light-House Board have determined after investigation that Bluff Shoal, a point not a great distance from the former location, is a better site; and this bill is simply to authorize the building of a light station on Bluff Shoal, and repealing the former act making the appropriation for the other place.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMALL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOHN HORNICK.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 8108) for the relief of John Hornick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John Hornick, having served in the infantry service of the United States for more than three years during the war of the rebellion, and having been honorably discharged from such service, be, and he is hereby, relieved from any disability now or heretofore existing, since the date of his said discharge, by reason of any defective naturalization, or by reason of not having been duly naturalized under the laws of the United States; and he is hereby authorized to prosecute, in the Court of Claims of the United States, Indian depredation claim numbered in said court 10389 and entitled "John Hornick, Fred T. Evans, and Richard Dunn v. The United States and the Sioux Indians," in which cause judgment was rendered by said court on the 14th day of January, A. D. 1901; and the said court is hereby authorized and directed to reinstate the said cause, so far as the same pertains to the claim of the said John Hornick, and upon the facts, as found and returned by said court, to enter judgment in said cause in favor of the said John Hornick for the sum of $1,556.66, with such costs as he may be entitled to recover under existing law and the rules of said court, the same as if he had been a citizen of the United States at the time said depredation was committed.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

First. That the words "more than," in the fourth line of the first page thereof, be stricken out, and that there be inserted in lieu thereof the word "nearly."

Second. By inserting immediately after the word "Court," in the fifth line of the second page thereof, the words "is authorized."

Third. By striking out the words "the sum of one thousand five hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents," on the second page thereof, and inserting in lieu thereof the following words: "such sum as he would have been entitled to recover in said action," and that with the adoption of such amendments your committee recommend that the bill be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two in reference to this bill and the reason for pressing a bill of this individual character when there is now pending before the Committee on Claims a bill to put into the attitude of this citizen, so far as the prosecution of claims for Indian depredations is concerned, every citizen against whom conditions just as hard as this case indicates are pressing. That bill has been offered in three separate Congresses to my knowledge. It provides for an amendment to the statute, so that men who were not citizens, but who subsequently became citizens, can prosecute claims for Indian depredations. Now, I would like the gentleman to say why the general bill should not be passed instead of his bill to cover an individual case like this?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman I desire, in the first place, to say that this bill as reported received the unanimous support of the Committee on the Judiciary. In the next place, I do not believe that there are any cases pending before the House on just a parallel with this one. I will state some of the peculiar facts connected with this case. Mr. Hornick came to the United States from Ireland with his father when he was about eight years of age and located in the State of Illinois. There his father voted at elections; and from the general report in the family Mr. Hornick supposed his father was naturalized, and by reason of that supposed he was a citizen of the United States.

In 1861, when Mr. Hornick was about eighteen years of age, he listed in the Army and served in the Army for about three years. His military record, as we have it from the War Department, is a good one. During all the three years he was only absent from roll call three times, once while he was in the hospital from the result of a gunshot wound received in the service; another time while he was in hospital, disabled from disease contracted in the service, and the third was when he was on detailed duty. These are the only times that he was absent from duty during his service in the Army. During the war his company was engaged in 30 battles and young Hornick took part in 28 of them. At the expiration of his term of enlistment he was honorably discharged. He went into business in Sioux City, Iowa, and continued in business there, exercising all the rights and privileges of citizenship, believing himself to be a citizen of the United States. He voted at elections and performed such other duties as generally devolve upon citizens of the country.

In 1876 he, in connection with Fred T. Evans and Richard Dunn, engaged in the freighting business from points in the then Territory of Dakota and Nebraska into the Black Hills. That was before there were any railroads built out into that country. They had a large herd of cattle and horses used in this business. Sometime in the spring of 1877 they started from a point in Nebraska with a load of freight up to the Black Hills. After discharging their freight at Deadwood they went into camp some miles out from that place and put their herd under guard, and while there a band of the Sioux Indians made a raid upon them, killing one of the guards, stampeded their herd, and ran off a large amount of their stock, none of which was ever recovered. After the act of 1891 conferred jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to adjudicate and determine claims for Indian depredations committed against citizens of the United States by tribes of Indians in amity with the Government, these parties, Mr. Hornick, Mr. Evans, and Mr. Dunn, commenced their action in that court to recover their damages sustained by this depredation. During the trial of that case it developed that Mr. Hornick was of foreign birth, and upon inquiry no record of his naturalization could be found; and upon this evidence the court in that case made this finding of facts:

This case having been heard by the Court of Claims, the court, upon the evidence, makes the following

FINDING OF FACT.

I. At the time of the depredation stated Fred T. Evans and Richard Dunn were citizens of the United States.

II. At the time of the depredation hereinafter stated John Hornick was not a citizen of the United States.

III. On the 10th day of March, 1877, near Whitewood Creek, Crook City, in the then Territory of Dakota, now State of South Dakota, Indians belonging to the Sioux tribe of Indians took and drove away property of said claimants, which at the time and place of the taking was reasonably worth the sum of $4,556.

Said property was taken as aforesaid without just cause or provocation on the part of the owners or the agent in charge and has never been returned or paid for.

IV. At the time of said depredation the defendant Indians were in amity with the United States.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court decrees, as a conclusion of law, that Fred T. Evans and Richard Dunn recover judgment against the United States and the Sioux tribe of Indians in the sum of $3,104, being two-thirds of the amount found due, as above set forth.

It is ordered that out of the said judgment the sum of $545 be allowed and paid J. S. Lothrop, esq., claimants' attorney of record, in full and for all services in this cause.

No allowance is made to John Hornick, and the petition as to his interest is dismissed for the reason set forth in Finding II.

On this finding of facts and the conclusions of law as stated by the court judgment was rendered in favor of Fred T. Evans and Richard Dunn for two-thirds of the amount found due as damages on account of the depredations, and dismissed the petition as to John Hornick solely on the ground that he was not a citizen of the United States at the time that the depredation was committed, and not being a citizen, he could not invoke the jurisdiction of the court under the provisions of the act of 1891.

The only purpose of this bill is to invest Mr. Hornick with the rights and privileges of a citizen granted by that act and give him a standing in the Court of Claims the same as if he had been a citizen.

The justice of the bill, under the circumstances surrounding this case, I do not believe can, with any reasonable degree of propriety, be questioned by any, and therefore I earnestly urge its passage by the House.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. To corroborate his statement that this bill comes from the Committee on the Judiciary, after a full investigation, with the unanimous report of that committee; and it seems to me that the very reason that the gentleman from Texas is using for his opposition to this bill is a reason why it should pass—namely, that general measures covering such bills as this have been introduced in three sessions of Congress and have not passed; and the claimant in this case, it seems to me, if he waits upon general legislation, would have to wait three more Congresses, and maybe thirty times three before his claim can ever be paid. I hope this bill will pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like just a few words in reply to my friend from Alabama and to the gentleman from Iowa. I have no doubt that any bill which the gentleman from Iowa earnestly supports and heartily recommends to this House is founded in justice. I knew nothing about this case. I have very little doubt but that this man should be paid, but I do know that in the States of the Dakotas, in Wyoming, in Montana, in Colorado, in the Territory of New Mexico, and in the State of Texas, and perhaps in other States with which I am not familiar, there are a number of cases that are parallel to this in every respect. Justice has been denied these citizens also. Their property has been destroyed by Indians, and they have never been able to recover in the Court of Claims. They have had no standing in the Court of Claims, because they were not citizens at the time of the depredations.

Now, upon the frontier of Texas, during the civil war, when the troops of the Government were otherwise engaged and not able to give protection to the frontiersman, the Indians made repeated raids, destroyed property, burned houses, stole cattle and horses, and took them away. These people, good, honest citizens, excellent men, at that time not citizens, because they were all of foreign birth and had not had time or the opportunity to become citizens, were robbed and outraged. Since then they have become citizens of the United States, and they feel and believe that the Government owed them absolute protection, and that the Government should remunerate them for the losses that they suffered. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection to the gentleman's bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Very well.

Mr. TALBERT. I could not hear in the confusion, but I heard the gentleman say something about disability. I would like to ask him if this is a bill to remove the charge of desertion?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. It is not.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice that this bill comes from the Judiciary Committee. It is a bill for a private claim, and the gentleman who introduces it should have sent it to the Claims Committee, where it would come up in the regular order at the Friday session devoted to that purpose. I think, from the statement of the gentleman from Iowa, this is a just bill, and I shall not object to it at this time. But I want to give notice to the gentleman that I propose to object hereafter to the consideration of private bills presented for unanimous consent, a day having been set aside each month for their consideration, and that they will not be able to get a right of way by referring them to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I object, on the ground stated by the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Subsequently—

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I made the objection because I understood the bill to be of a character that should be acted upon at the Friday session, but I understand that I am in error in that regard, and I now withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object, but I wish to state that there are thousands of claims over the western part of this country in exactly the same condition. I do not think the committees of the House should pick out special bills and put them before the Committee on the Judiciary when a general bill would cover every case of that kind. In 1890, I believe it was, a bill covering the entire ground was introduced, limited to three years; that bill passed in 1892 and the time expired in 1895. A great many just claims were barred by this act and never filed. These claims belonged to heirs, married women, and men who could not look after their interests and they can not now be filed for adjudication. They can not now be adjudicated although the claimants have been robbed and plundered by various Indian tribes all over the Western country. I do not think it is right for Congress to refuse to pass a general bill when it allows members to pick out here and there a special bill for consideration. I shall not object to this bill, however, but I want to call the attention of the House to this kind of legislation and to urge the passage of a general bill covering all cases of this kind. I have had such a bill before this House for years and it should become a law.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TRANSFER OF CAUSES IN UNITED STATES COURTS TO ADJOINING DISTRICTS.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10380) to authorize the transfer to an adjoining district of causes in the district or circuit courts of the United States in which the judge of the district wherein such causes are pending is disqualified.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever a district judge is for any reason disqualified to try any cause pending before him, or in the district or circuit court of the district of which he is judge, it shall be his duty to make and file with the clerk a certificate showing such fact and the grounds of such disqualification; and thereupon, on motion of any party to such cause, or his attorney of record, and on notice to the other parties interested represented by attorney, the clerk shall enter an order transferring the cause to an adjoining district for trial, which shall be nearest, so far as practicable, to the litigants, and will best serve their convenience: Provided, That the parties to said cause may, by agreement in writing, filed with the clerk of the court in which said cause is pending, designate the court in such adjoining district to which said cause shall be transferred.

SEC. 2. That jurisdiction of all causes so transferred is hereby conferred upon the courts and judges in the district to which transferred.

With the following committee amendments:

After the word "judge," in line 5, page 1, insert "and the circuit judge shall from any reason fail to try such cause or assign some other judge to try the same within a reasonable time."

After the words "it shall be," in line 5, page 1, strike out the words "his duty" and insert "the duty of said district judge so disqualified."

In line 6, page 1, strike out the word "facts" and insert the word "fact."

In line 1, page 2, strike out the letters "ni" and insert "in."

In line 3, page 2, strike out the word "court" and insert "division."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RANDELL of Texas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOHN F. ANTLITZ.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 610) to correct the military record of John F. Antlitz.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire whether this is not a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And is on the Private Calendar?

Mr. PARKER. It is not on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is in order on Friday?

Mr. PARKER. No; it is not in order on Friday, because it is not a bill to remove the charge of desertion at all. It is simply a bill on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I should like an opportunity to make a brief explanation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is almost impossible for us to catch the purport of these bills as read here in the midst of so much confusion. But here is a bill proposing, according to its title, "to correct the military record of John F. Antlitz." Now, it strikes me that it must be a bill to remove the charge of desertion——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Or a bill to qualify this man to apply for a pension; and if so, it is not in order on Friday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this bill would be in order under the rule on either Friday.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I must object to any bill which has its day in court under the rule.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

REVOLUTIONARY TROPHIES AT ALLEGHENY ARSENAL, PITTSBURG, PA.

Mr. DALZELL. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 106) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to give to the Pennsylvania Society of the Sons of the American Revolution the custody of certain Revolutionary trophies at Allegheny Arsenal, Pittsburg, Pa., was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to give to the Pennsylvania Society of the Sons of the American Revolution the custody of the two 3-pounder and five 4-pounder brass guns, without carriages, relics of the Revolutionary war, now at the Allegheny Arsenal, Pittsburg, Pa., to be kept at the Carnegie Institute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. MADDOX. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear an explanation.

Mr. DALZELL. This bill comes from the Committee on Military Affairs, the report being unanimous. In the Allegheny Arsenal, at Pittsburg, there are three or four, perhaps five, small brass cannon—relics of the Revolutionary war. The Allegheny Arsenal is about to be abandoned, and the Secretary of War had directed that these cannon be sent to the Watervliet Arsenal, in the State of New York. Of course the citizens of Pittsburg are very desirous to keep in their own midst these Revolutionary trophies; and consequently this resolution provides that the Secretary of War may, at his discretion, loan these cannon to the Pennsylvania Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, who will deposit them for safe-keeping and for public inspection in the Carnegie Institute.

Mr. RAY of New York. How can the gentleman expect that a New Yorker, if he wishes to preserve a consistent record as such, can sit here and allow such a resolution as this to go through?

Mr. DALZELL. I should be very sorry if any New Yorker should make objection to so reasonable a request on behalf of the citizens of Pittsburg.

Mr. RAY of New York. These trophies, as I understand, will go to New York if we do not pass this bill.

Mr. DALZELL. These articles are of no use except as trophies; and there is no New York association to which they might with any propriety go; whereas there is a Pennsylvania association—a Pittsburg association especially—to whom we propose to give the custody of these cannon. They have been at Pittsburg for one hundred years.

Mr. PAYNE. May I suggest to my colleague [Mr. RAY of New York] that we have plenty of such things in New York, and Pennsylvania is a little short in that regard? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. My colleague [Mr. PAYNE], who is a colleague of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] on the Committee on Ways and Means, appears to be willing to deprive New York of trophies which it ought to have, in order that he may "stand in" well with his associate on the committee. He ought to think more of the great State of New York than of his colleague on the committee, although the latter gentleman is no doubt entitled to very great consideration. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania has already had a bill passed today by unanimous consent. He gets something every day, and it strikes me that he is rather selfish in asking to have these trophies diverted from the great State of New York.

Mr. DALZELL. "The great State of New York" does not need them. So far as concerns the suggestion that I am "getting something every day," this is the first day I have had a show. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. If there is no objection on the part of New York to this request, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania "stand in" with us in the future to assist New York? [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. That would depend upon the circumstances.

Mr. RAY of New York. I mean under proper circumstances.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, always.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The following amendments, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, were read, and agreed to:

In line 4 strike out the words "and directed to give" and insert the words "in his discretion to loan."

In line 6 strike out the words "the custody of."

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Pennsylvania Society of the Sons of the American Revolution certain Revolutionary trophies at Allegheny Arsenal, Pittsburg, Pennsylvania."

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BOILER INSPECTION.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 946.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to amend section 4400 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to a reciprocal recognition of boiler-inspection certificates between the several maritime nations having marine-inspection laws.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4400 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding to said section, as amended by the act of Congress approved March 1, 1895, chapter 146, page 699, volume 28, United States Statutes at Large, third session Fifty-third Congress, after the word "aforesaid," a provision as follows: Provided, however, That when such foreign passenger steamers belong to countries having inspection laws approximating those of the United States, and have unexpired certificates of inspection issued by the proper authorities in the respective countries to which they belong, they shall be subject to no other inspection than necessary to satisfy the local inspectors that the condition of the vessel, her boilers, and life-saving equipments are as stated in the current certificate of inspection; but no such certificate of inspection shall be accepted as evidence of lawful inspection except when presented by steam vessels of other countries which have by their laws accorded to the steam vessels of the United States visiting such countries the same privilege accorded herein to the steam vessels of such countries visiting the United States; it being further provided that there shall be collected and paid into the Treasury of the United States the same fees for the inspection of foreign passenger steamers carrying passengers from the United States that any foreign nation shall charge the merchant vessels of the United States trading to the ports of such nationality; it being further provided that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the power to waive at any time the collection of such fees upon due notice of the proper authorities of any country concerned that the collection of fees for the inspection of American steam merchant vessels has been discontinued.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask to have the report read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear an explanation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is a Senate bill——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has it been reported by the House committee?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is a Senate bill which was unanimously reported by the Senate committee, and has also been unanimously reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of the House. The point about the matter is this: There has been some confusion growing out of the divergence in the language of the laws of inspection of the various countries; so that in some cases our ships in foreign ports have been subjected to the expense of a complete inspection of all that relates to the equipment of the ship, and this has become a somewhat important and expensive charge.

Now, this bill proposes simply this, that if a ship comes into our ports it shall only be subjected to so much of an inspection as will show that it is the same ship carried and covered by the inspection certificate of a foreign country, provided that foreign country gives the same reciprocal treatment to our ships in foreign ports. The bill is recommended by the Treasury Department and by the Supervisor of Vessels, and by everybody in our Government interested in the matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him what is required under the law as it now stands?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The law as it now stands is indefinite as to whether our people may not require a complete certification of all that relates to the ship, and this is intended to establish a reciprocal relation between other countries and our country, so as to get rid of the unnecessary expense of the investigation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is it customary in the ports of Europe that when an American ship comes in there our certificates of boiler inspection are accepted?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not speak of all the countries of Europe, but unless they do accept our certificates, then we do not extend to them that reciprocity of investigation. I think the gentleman will see it is only intended that we shall be able to put ourselves in the same favorable relation that we extend to others.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does this bill in any way prevent the American authorities from an inspection of a vessel, if they deem it necessary?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all; but, on the contrary, it provides that they may inspect it, to ascertain whether it is in all respects the ship covered by the certificate of the foreign country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to say that the bill had been considered by the House committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It has, and is unanimously reported by that committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is it necessary that this bill should be considered by unanimous consent? Why not get it up regularly under the rule?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It will take a little less time now, if the gentleman will not object, than it will at some other time when we have bills that are debatable. This is a bill urged by the Treasury Department, and I am only discharging my duty, having no interest whatever beyond that; and I think, if the gentleman will not object to the bill, it will be out of the way in a very few seconds.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. So many good bills are awaiting consideration—that is all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. A good many of them are getting heard also.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BURKE OF TEXAS.

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Speaker, it being now within a few minutes of the hour for the special order, I ask unanimous consent that the special order be taken up.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Texas for the special order will be taken up at this time.

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers the following resolutions, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended in order that an opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. ROBERT E. BURKE, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege to know and to associate with my distinguished predecessor as a Representative in this House, and consequently I can not speak of him with that nearness and knowledge as a Congressman that his former colleagues here can and will speak; but for twelve years I did know him as a man, as a lawyer, as a judge on the bench, and as a private citizen, and I can speak of him personally, professionally, and in all the relations in which one man can know and judge another. He was a man singularly free of guile in his personal and private intercourse. Kind, generous, considerate, and thoughtful for all those with whom he came in contact, he was one of the most benevolent and conscientious friends to all mankind that I ever knew.

On the bench, in which capacity I best knew him, he was tireless, painstaking, indefatigable, and consistently faithful to the right as he understood it and could best conceive it. No man ever lived in the community in which for thirty years he was a conspicuous citizen who ever enjoyed an equal degree of personal popularity, esteem and public confidence, and this meed of universal and uniform credit was due to the unbroken courtesy of his demeanor, the unfaltering kindness of his intercourse and the unquestioned honesty of his motive in all his conduct and attitude toward his fellow-men in every relation of life—personal, professional, and political. What more could be said of any man, and what higher tribute was ever paid to any man's career in the community in which he lived and labored?

He came to Texas as a young man from that State that has contributed more to the growth and greatness of Texas than all the other States in the American Union. Texas from the foundations of its civilization has been a composite production, a mosaic of heterogeneous elements. Out of a complex and almost incongruous mixture of various populations and contradictory influences she has evolved a homogeneous and vigorous citizenship, composed from all possible factors and combining all imaginable elements of strength; but it is a remarkable and significant fact that I may be permitted to mention here and now that Texas owes more of her distinguished names at the bar, on the bench, in the forum, and in every walk of useful enterprise to the State of Alabama than to any other one State in the Union.

It was there that Judge BURKE was born, and from there, as a mere boy, he went out among that gay and gallant host of Southern cavaliers who rode down to death in that far-off summer of '61 with as dauntless mien and as serene a front as any knight-errant who buckled on his armor "in fantastic Gothic chapel, beneath storied windows richly dight." Like so many others of that brave but defeated host he found a new home in a new land, and the echoes of the fading conflict found him a citizen of Texas, ready to build up his fortunes and to link his fate with hers in the dismal days of reconstruction.

Living at first in eastern Texas, he came in 1870 to Dallas, where for the next thirty years he wrought out his successful and honored life among the thrifty and ambitious people of that metropolitan city and county. There was no honor that his people did not freely bestow upon him—there was no labor that he did not willingly perform for them; and so he lived and labored in a congenial atmosphere of generous and grateful appreciation by the citizens whom he so often and so signally served. It would be useless to reiterate here the many acts of personal and private kindness that endeared him to the people among whom he lived and who have not ceased to mourn his death. They are canonized among the sacred recollections of his neighbors and friends.

It would be equally fruitless to recall the many services he rendered his constituents in the various capacities in which he served them. They are recorded in the annals of his State's and his country's history. We to-day come to commemorate his virtues, to speak kindly and affectionately of his memory, and to send out to his people and to all those who value the recognition of merit and nobility a testimony of our enduring regard for a well-spent and virtuous life. It has been said that "Genius can mold no marble so speaking as the place where a brave man labored or the spot where a good man died." If this is true, then this Hall ought to be the perpetual memorial of such men as the one whose death we to-day lament, as their own homes will unceasingly bear witness to the irreparable loss of their presence and influence.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, eulogies, as they seem to me, have followed so near the line of flattery that in the past I have refrained from taking part in such as have been presented. But the truth at this time is not flattery, although during the lifetime of a person it is not well at all times even to speak the whole truth.

The late Mr. BURKE became a member of this body in the Fifty-fifth Congress, and was assigned to the committee of which I had the honor to be chairman. In the past I have watched men come to Congress, remain a while, and retire again to private life without even having left a lasting mark upon the country or in this body; but Mr. BURKE almost from the very moment he entered this House became a prominent figure.

As a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads soon after he had been assigned to that committee he was selected, together with Judge McPherson, Mr. BROMWELL, and myself, to revise and codify the postal laws, both civil and criminal. Those laws had not been revised for more than a half of a century. The work demanded the almost undivided attention of the members of the subcommittee for more than four months during the long session and nearly thirty days during the short session. And I wish to speak of him as I knew him on the floor and as I knew him in the committee—an honest, fearless, patient, intelligent, faithful worker, not alone for the interests of his district or his State, but for the whole country at large. His mind was so broad that it knew no North or South, East or West. His impulses and acts were for the betterment of the whole country. I have in days gone by segregated legislators and denominated some as local legislators and others as national legislators.

Of the latter class Mr. BURKE was in the foremost rank. The local legislator to whom I refer, and we have many—and they should not be condemned, because they are necessary—look to the interests of their districts first and, in many cases, the country afterwards. Mr. BURKE kept in view at all times his duty as a national legislator—looked first to the interests of the country and next to the interests of his own particular locality.

During the consideration of this bill of more than 225 printed pages, to which I have referred, which occupied the time of this House eight or nine days, divided as it was, covering a period of nearly three weeks, then in failing health and a constant sufferer, he was here in his place, across the aisle from where I now stand, having the confidence not alone of his own side of the House, but the confidence of this whole body. His voice and his influence there were felt in such a degree that that bill came out of this House with no amendment of any importance whatever.

It was said in my presence, what I have never repeated before, but what his family, his friends, and the people in his district have a right to know, that our lamented President, William McKinley, took occasion to highly commend Mr. BURKE for the faithful and efficient work he had performed in connection with that legislation, and that he deserved well of his country.

Words that I shall speak are not flattery. The citizens of his district have lost a man that it would be almost impossible to replace. The country has suffered in the loss of Mr. BURKE as great a loss as it has suffered for many years.

Mr. MCCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, I can not tell you how shocked I was less than two weeks ago to learn for the first time that Mr. BURKE was dead. Out of the country at the time of his death, I had not heard of it. Since I learned of his death I have had no opportunity to make suitable preparation to speak of him, and yet I can not allow this opportunity to pass by without saying at least a few words.

I did not know our friend in his home relations; I did not have the honor of serving with him on any committee, and, therefore, I speak as one who learned of him, as most of us learned of him, by seeing him performing his duties here upon the floor of this House. As my friend from California [Mr. LOUD] has said, Mr. BURKE came to this House in the Fifty-fifth Congress. Before he had been here long I noted his expressions on the floor. My first thought of him was, there is a man who has opinions; he is a thoughtful man; he comes to his conclusions after due deliberation; he thinks as a judge thinks; he talks as a judge talks.

Mr. BURKE had a happy way of expressing his thought; he spoke with deliberation; he evidently thought along straight lines. His judgments were clear, as were the expressions of them. I noted especially the courtesy of the treatment which he always accorded to those who differed with him. He realized, Mr. Speaker, that it is no easy task to come to a righteous conclusion on any subject. He realized that we see things from different standpoints, and that in many matters there is room for honest difference of opinion.

In the tones of his voice, in the framing of his sentences, you always felt there was a man whose own opinions were honestly held, and who could realize that a person who differed with him was just as honest and just as capable of forming an opinion. Incapable of double dealing himself, he seemed always to expect and almost always to receive from those with whom he differed frankness in expression. I honored him; I miss him; I mourn him.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, of the many illustrious men who have represented Texas upon this floor, none brought to the discharge of his high duties a loftier conception of the right, cleaner hands, purer patriotism, or a stronger and more patient diligence than did ROBERT EMMET BURKE. What he did was done honestly, according to high conception of duty and with painstaking thoroughness. And it was in this manner that he discharged his duties to his God, his family, and his country from the moment he shouldered his musket in 1863, in defense of the Confederacy, until that fateful moment in the early dawn of a Texas June day when he closed his eyes forever upon the scenes of this world.

It is not necessary to relate here his career in the army of the South. Perhaps nothing should be said further than that he volunteered as a private when a beardless boy and served in the ranks with the devotion, zeal, courage, and self-sacrifice which have immortalized the soldiery of the Confederacy. He entered the army in 1863, and followed his country's flag until it was furled forever, and its people's hopes were dead. In the year succeeding the war he joined the ranks of thousands of his former comrades and moved to Texas, where, under the new conditions afforded by a new State, he commenced his life anew. At this time he was but 19 years of age, and all that he carried with him was a good character, a willingness to work, and an ambition to make something of himself, and this was an equipment that could not fail; it has never failed, and never will.

The war had seriously interfered with his education, and the first years of his residence in Texas were devoted to work by day and study at night. With lofty aims in view, he was steadfast and true at a time when there were many temptations to swerve a young man from the paths of rectitude. It was not long before he attracted the attention of the best people of Jefferson, his new home, and he was recognized by all as a sturdy, diligent, honest, self-respecting young man. He was admitted to the bar in November, 1870, and the following year moved to Dallas.

His exemplary life, recognized legal ability, and amiable personality brought him to the front rapidly, and in 1878 he was elected county judge, to which position he was twice reelected. In 1888 he was elected district judge, and served in this capacity for eight years, and was then elected Representative from the Dallas district to the Fifty-fifth Congress, and was reelected in 1898, and again in 1900.

I mention these facts to show how thoroughly he enjoyed the confidence of the people among whom he lived. That he deserved this confidence, a life of virtue, temperance, fidelity, and conscientious devotion to the public welfare is ample proof.

As a member of this body he achieved all for his people and his country consistent with the opportunities which were afforded him, and it may be said that in every public capacity in which he served his achievement came well up to limits of his opportunity. Those who served with him on committees well remember how diligent he was, how well he bore his responsibilities, and how loyal he was to the interests confided to him. On the floor of the House he was a patient investigator, a ready debater, and at all times a loyal and knightly champion of the principles for which he stood. In all the relations of private and public life he did his duty nobly and left the rest to God.

During the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress his health failed him, but he clung to his duty until the session's end. Even through days and nights of illness, sometimes of intense pain, he wearied not, for he was looking hopefully to his return home to his loved ones and friends, and was confident that the balmy breezes and gentle sunshine of his beloved State would bring the healing for which he longed. He wanted to live, and surely there was every incentive to a love for life. He was in the prime of life, and around him a loving wife, two sturdy sons grown to manhood, and a daughter just budding into womanhood. He was never more firmly intrenched in the confidence and affections of his people. There was much work he wanted to do for his country and his State, and he had in process plans of great moment to the people who had honored him.

But it was not to be. He returned to Texas to find the fields radiant with the flowers of spring and the perfumed zephyrs vibrant with the music of the birds. No wonder he felt that those cloudless days and nights would bring him health. But he steadily declined until the fears of anxious loved ones became painful, and soon came a physical collapse which portended the gravest consequences. Then it was that the love of a great people enveloped the cottage wherein he suffered and thousands of hearts poured out their earnest prayers for his life.

God knew best. In the dim and misty hours of the morning, while the world was hushed in slumber, under the shadows of a starlit sky, God whispered, and the soul of ROBERT EMMET BURKE joined the great majority. With a serene and all-sufficient faith in the promises of his Redeemer he laid aside the burdens of this world, its affections, its hopes, and its ambitions, and obeyed the summons of his Maker.

Mr. Speaker, in the broad and loving bosom of the majestic Commonwealth of Texas reposes the ashes of many noble and gallant sons—men who have enriched the history of all humanity for all time with their splendid achievements. Texas herself is a monument to the deeds of a great and noble people. While ROBERT EMMET BURKE may not have equaled in many respects the accomplishments of men like Houston, Austin, Crockett, Travis, and a host of patriots whose names are immortalized forever, he performed every duty confided to him with loyal devotion to the people of his State and country; and in his personal contact with his fellow-men he gave the loftiest example of husband, father, and citizen. Tenderly the State he loved so well received his dust to her bosom, and gratefully will the people remember his honest, useful, and gentle life.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, we have set apart this day to commemorate the life of ROBERT EMMET BURKE, and I wish to pay a brief but sincere tribute to his memory. Others who knew him more intimately than I have pronounced his eulogy and described his career.

My acquaintance with him did not extend over any great length of time. I simply knew him as a fellow-member of Congress, a coworker on the same committee and on the floor of this House. But, short as this acquaintance was, I learned to love and respect him for his sterling uprightness, his devotion to duty and what he believed to be right. His word was as good as his bond. He was courteous to all, and he never turned a deaf ear to a worthy appeal. He represented the true type of a Southern gentleman—gracious, open-hearted, generous, the kind of a man who makes friends and holds them.

Mr. BURKE came to Congress with the indorsement of his people and with a reputation gained in the faithful service rendered in many official positions. For three consecutive terms the people of Dallas County chose him as their county judge, and such was his judicial record that he was elected district judge of his State and reelected, the second time without opposition. During the two terms he was a member of Congress he proved the wisdom of his people in electing him to this House. No favor was too slight for him to grant, if possible; no constituent of his appealed to him in vain. Rich and poor, great and small, all were treated with that kind consideration and gentle courtesy which were so characteristic of the man. He performed the duties of a member of this House not grudgingly, but with a willing heart and with faithful devotion to his people.

In the deliberations of the committee of which we were both members his advice was always welcome. He proved himself a fair and broad-minded legislator who ever tried to do his duty as he saw it, and feared not to state his position upon the questions of the day. To him everything that was false, everything that savored of a sham, was distasteful, and when he spoke his voice had the true ring of a truthful, fearless man who knew his own mind and dared to speak it.

In the daily routine life of a legislator, so full of disappointments, or petty annoyances, we delight in the hearty grasp of the honest hand of a friend. To find a sympathetic soul is like the breaking out of the sun on a cloudy morn. Such a man was ROBERT BURKE. "His song was of love," of integrity; his master chords were manhood and brotherhood. If there were any discords in his life, "they were mere interludes between the lines."

In the death of Mr. BURKE the House lost a valued member and the South one of its noblest sons. My heart went out toward him, and I esteemed him as a friend. The memory of that friendship, of our pleasant associations in this House, will ever remain a bright page in the book of my life. His public career stands boldly out, and we who are left behind can do no less than honor the memory of such a man as ROBERT EMMET BURKE and hand down to posterity our appreciation of him as a friend and associate.

He sleeps peacefully in the land of his adopted State. His memory is loved and honored by all who knew him. The spotless character he has left behind stands out as a lasting monument of fame for others to follow.

The welcome angel came
  Ere yet his eye with age was dim,
Or bent his stately frame;
  His weapon still was bright,
His shield was lifted high
  To slay the wrong, to save the right.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, when ROBERT EMMET BURKE, late a Representative from the State of Texas, died at his home in Dallas, Tex., on the 5th of June, 1901, the nation, the State, the Sixth Congressional district, and the county of Dallas, Tex., lost the services of one of the most faithful and useful men in public life. His many years on the bench of the county and district courts had stamped him as a fair and upright judge, who, by reason of his lofty sense of justice, had made himself not only invincible before the electors of his county and district, but who had won the respect and approbation of the bench and bar throughout the State of Texas.

He was not technical, but broad and just in his rulings as a judge, and while he was not at all times sustained by the higher courts (and what judge is?) in his decisions on law points, he never could be justly criticised for not reaching for the equity of the case in every instance. He rather clung to the spirit than the letter of the law and aimed always to do substantial justice, and no litigant who came into his court with clean hands ever had a right to complain at the motive of his judgments, and no one, whether friend or foe, can justly say that he ever swerved from the path of right and duty as he saw it. This is all the best and the purest can do who wear the judicial ermine, and it is after all the highest encomium that can be paid a judge on the bench.

No wonder that on account of his faithful services as a nisi prius judge the people of the Sixth Congressional district intrusted him with the wider and more varied duties of a Representative in the American Congress. They did not misplace their confidence, for not only did he bring to his new sphere of action his rugged honesty, his good common sense, his industry, and his unerring judgment of men, but he displayed an aptitude and natural ease to acquaint himself with public men and measures which at once inspired confidence in the National Legislature and pushed him to the front as a painstaking, reliable, and successful representative of the people. In his committees he was appreciated and justly classed by his associates as a wise counselor and an indefatigable worker, frank, honest, industrious, and practical, and when the bills which his committees reported to the House were taken up for consideration in the Committee of the Whole House there was not a member on his committees who inspired greater confidence, who could more readily and lucidly discuss these measures in debate, or who evinced a fuller grasp of the questions at issue than he.

Not only would he give every bill in his committees careful consideration and insist on a clear explanation of all its features, but he would not rest until he had mastered the subject fully himself, and he possessed the happy faculty of explaining and imparting his understanding to others. In the House he was tactful and resourceful in debate, and his aim was always to enlighten and help along the side of a question which he espoused rather than simply to appear conspicuous in debate. He was modest and courteous almost to a fault, and yet he never permitted this modesty to deter him to speak out in forceful terms when duty required. He was incessantly at his post of duty and never shirked to record his vote on the side of right as he saw it and as his conscience dictated. True to the tenets of his party, he was above small party tactics and was fearless and independent in word and action in the highest patriotic sense.

His views on the great questions of the day were broad and liberal and always thoroughly American and Democratic, and while he may not always have exhibited the tact of the politician he always showed the courage and strong common sense of the statesman. He was true as the needle to the pole to the interests of his constituents, and he shunned neither work nor personal discomfort to serve them in and out of season. He stood well among all the members of this great legislative body, regardless as to party lines, and had the full confidence of them all. With such favorable surroundings, together with such rare traits of character and natural capacity and adaptability for Congressional work, it is clear that he was eminently successful and that he gave promise of ranking with the best and most useful men the great State of Texas has ever sent to the Congress of the United States.

But when all this and more has been said of him as a public servant, there remains to be said that which is still a higher encomium of his worth, and that is that in the private walks of life he shone as an exemplar. Never could a man, woman, or child, the rich or the poor, the high or the low who enjoyed his friendship have a more loyal friend. His nature was impervious to either guile, malice, or deceit; he was true as steel. No enemy (and every good man has them) could point his finger to BURKE and justly say that he ever dealt him an unfair or much less a foul blow. BURKE was not only a Chesterfield in manner, but a Navarre in action. In the fierce battles of the forum he did not stoop to little things or to the use of the shafts of slander, but he hit straight from the shoulder and bore himself with knightly courage toward his adversary.

His lance never made a cowardly thrust, nor did there rest a blotch on either his shield or armor. His loyalty as a friend was as sincere as that of a child; he trusted and could be trusted in return. His companionship was as chaste and genial as that of a good woman; his conversation, manner, and conduct full of good cheer, hope, and kindness. His aims and aspirations were lofty, his motives pure, his integrity incorruptible, his convictions true. He loved truth and practiced it in his everyday life; he was generous and forgiving to a fault and abhorred sham and hypocrisy.

Devoted to the partner of his bosom, his children, and his home, he was withal a consistent Christian gentleman, who practiced what he preached—the Golden Rule. Not only is he mourned in grand old Texas, and by every member of the Texas delegation, but by the members of this great body. His name and fame extend far beyond the confines of the Lone Star State, which he loved and so ably represented in part on this floor, and they will endure and live as long as the good deeds of a noble, useful, and blameless life lie treasured in the hearts and are recorded in the history of the American people.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, it is not more than a just estimate to say that ROBERT E. BURKE was an able lawyer, an upright citizen, a faithful Representative, and a Southern gentleman. Moreover, if other words may be necessary for the whole truth, heat all times showed good will toward his fellow-man and an abiding faith in the wisdom, justice, and mercy of the Heavenly Father.

The good servant has performed faithfully the life task set for him and has gone from amongst us—the Master has called him. Human hearts sorrow and human tears fall, for the mortality has been planted in the dust in order that, through the resurrection, immortality may bloom and fruit and bloom and fruit again and without end in that hereafter, which we truthfully and lovingly call heaven.

"To lie in cold obstruction and to rot" is not the end of just men who have served and pleased God. The sublime love of Him who maketh not for the purpose of destroying has sent the Christ who reaches down his hand beneath the dust and marble covering and lifteth up those who have departed in His faith and favor. This is, this must be, the consoling truth for men who grieve and women who weep and also grieve. Say not to the agonized, "I know not." Rather say, "Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief." Materialism may challenge Christianity to combat, but the weapon of the first is "of the earth earthy," and the sword of the latter is the everlasting truth, fighting for the soul of man. He that can say "I know that my Redeemer liveth" is comforted and enjoys the blessings of truth and of a philosophy both sublime and divine.

Mr. Speaker, it is not for the benefit of the dead we pay respect to his memory. What men now say can not harm him or add to his happiness, for he sleeps and hears us not. We would stand appalled in the presence of death if we could not answer the question, "If a man die, shall he live again?" "I am the resurrection and the life," said the Saviour; "whomsoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die."

It is for the benefit of the living and those to come hereafter that we commemorate the virtues of the distinguished dead. Here we present the history, the example, of a good man, and from it we learn that industry, honesty, fidelity, and capacity are appreciated while embodied in the living, and that those virtues blossom in the dust and that on account of them the name of our distinguished friend has become a part of the records of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I came into Congress with Judge BURKE at the memorable extraordinary session of 1897. Very soon I learned to know him as a friend and as an industrious and careful legislator. Often in private conversation he would dwell with pride and pleasure upon his boyhood and early manhood, spent in his native Alabama. As the son loveth his mother, he cherished an abiding affection for the State of his birth—a State, as his worthy successor has beautifully and truthfully told us, that has contributed more than any other State of the Union in great names to Texas history. Mr. Speaker, permit me, while paying tribute to this distinguished man, Alabamian first and Texan by adoption, to acknowledge the compliment paid to the dead sons of my Commonwealth.

Perhaps I ought to forbear to praise the living. It, however, does no violence to propriety, even on this melancholy occasion, to refer to the senior Senator from Texas, CHARLES A. CULBERSON, and to Mr. SHEPPARD, the present Representative from the Fourth district of Texas—a district that has been represented here for twenty-six years by former Alabamians. It sent here from 1876 to 1896 Hon. David B. Culberson, who, though born in Georgia, was reared from infancy in Alabama; after him next came the late John B. Cranford, born in Clarke County, Ala., and then came the present incumbent. To me it is an interesting fact that these men and Judge BURKE, all of the full stature of American manhood, went, with the exception of Mr. Cranford, from the hills of east Alabama—Tallapoosa and Chambers counties—and all, with the exception of Judge Culberson, were natives of Alabama. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I may be pardoned for mentioning another great Alabamian, distinguished, and living in Texas—George Clark, of Waco—who went there as a young lawyer from his native county of Greene, in Alabama, and who is at once an ornament and a foremost member of the bar of Texas, and whose legal learning adorns the judicial history of the State of his adoption.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is of the distinguished dead I purposed to speak—of that part of Alabama's rich gift to the history of Texas. A roll call of the great men whose deeds and names enter so largely into the history of Texas would bring in review the lives and characters of many native sons of Alabama. Let me mention Patrick C. Jack, the leader of the first attempt at revolution, in 1832, and a famous orator and patriot; William H. Jack, his brother, and equally distinguished; Moseley Baker, a renowned soldier and statesman of the Republic of Texas and Sam Houston's bitterest enemy; Peter W. Grayson, a great judge, who served as chief justice of the supreme court of the Republic of Texas, and afterwards of the State of Texas; Richard Ellis, president of the convention that declared Texas independence and framed the first constitution of that republic; R. R. Royal, chairman of the "Consultation" in 1835; Pendleton Murrah, governor of that State from 1863 to 1865; A. J. Hamilton, provisional governor in 1866, and perhaps the unrivaled forensic orator in the annals of Texas, and who served in Congress in 1859; George F. Moore, chief justice of the supreme court, a profound jurist; Robert S. Gould, chief justice of the supreme court, and now a distinguished professor of law in the University of Texas. Add to these Abner S. Lipscomb, though born in South Carolina, was reared in Alabama, where he was at one time chief justice of the supreme court, and, after removal to Texas, was on the supreme court bench there for many years, and was one of the ablest of her judges. Let me not omit the name of Oran M. Roberts, who was born in South Carolina, but brought up in Alabama, and who saw his first official service as a member of the Alabama legislature; who went to Texas in 1841, and was there chief justice for sixteen years, and was at one time United States Senator, and twice governor.

Mr. Speaker, I could call the names of many other Alabamians who have added luster to the history of Texas, but those that I have mentioned serve to amply illustrate the truth of Alabama's contribution of great names to Texas history. The life, character, and public service of Judge BURKE furnish another name to the long list of patriotic Alabamians who gave their lives and dedicated their best energies to the development and advancement of Texas—a great State, indeed, and a magnificent and unequaled empire.

Our lamented friend and untiring coworker has gone. Heaven's benediction rest upon him. He has paid the last debt of nature. He has met the inevitable, and the inevitable is God's will. Peace be his, forever and forever.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, "ROBERT EMMET BURKE, of Dallas, was born in Tallapoosa County, Ala., August 1, 1847; volunteered as a private in Company D, Tenth Georgia Cavalry, at the age of 16 and served until the close of the war; removed to Texas in 1866 and located at Jefferson; was admitted to the bar in November, 1870; located at his present home in 1871; was elected county judge in 1878, serving three consecutive terms; was elected district judge in 1888, and was reelected in 1892 without opposition; was elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress as a Democrat."

This is the brief and modest autobiographic statement prepared for the Congressional Directory when he first entered Congress, and in his own language shows the principal events in the history of my dead colleague. It is to be commended for its simplicity and entire absence of self-laudation, and is quite illustrative of the man he was. It tells when and where he was born, his connection as a boy soldier with the Confederate army, his removal to Texas, his admission to the bar, and the official positions he held in the State of his adoption. If nothing more were said, he has told enough of himself in this concise and unpretentious narration of the chief incidents in his career to attract attention and elicit the favorable comment of any considerate man who may read it. It is now left to us to add to this sketch of his life the sad words, "He died on the 5th of June, 1901," and to pay suitable tribute to his memory.

Mr. Speaker, in the Southland it was something to be a Confederate soldier; it was much for a boy of 16 years to go forth to battle in response to his country's call and in vindication of his convictions of duty; it was, later on in his civic experience, a hard task to equip himself under adverse conditions for the engagements of a noble profession; it was an honor to be called to the bench and exercise the jurisdiction of different courts, and it was a distinction to be chosen from the great district he so faithfully represented as a member of Congress. To say that he well and worthily discharged all the duties connected with the various services he has rendered is to affirm what all who knew him will readily indorse.

I knew Judge BURKE perhaps more intimately than anyone with whom he was associated in Congress. There were many things that drew him and me together. In many respects we had a community of experience and aspiration. The friendship between us was close. We understood and confided in each other. I know that he was loyal to his constituency and ever ready to promote their interests. There was a punctuality in his devotion to their demands and a promptness in his attendance upon the sessions of the House and a vigilance of its proceedings that attracted private and public notice. He not only looked after the local measures of his people, but was always attentive to the consideration of general legislation and resolute in the expression of his views on national questions.

He had many friends in Washington, both in official and private circles. His uniform courtesy and pleasant mannerism gave him an easy entry into any of the departments where official business called him, and the expressions of sorrow at his death by those whom he met in such relations are many and sincere. He made an impression that will not soon fade away.

Judge BURKE was a courageous man. He asserted his convictions with great positiveness, and when he reached a conclusion he was insistent and unwavering in its maintenance. I have frequently heard him declare that he would vote for or against a proposition if no one else did. I do not think he could have been induced to do what he did not believe was right. He was a clean, pure, exemplary man, upright in his daily walk and conversation. He so demeaned himself that he was never in fear of any assaults upon or exposure of his modes of life. He conducted himself as became a gentleman and with that dignity that should mark a public representative. He eschewed all forms of dissipation. His standards and ideals of official deportment and personal excellence were lofty, and he lived up to them.

He was not what would be called a brilliant man, but he was reliable and trustworthy, careful to inform himself, and ready to go wherever his sense of duty led. There was nothing sensational in his composition. His was a steady, unostentatious, consistent course. He strove to be useful rather than showy, to accomplish results rather than to advertise himself. He coveted no undeserved approbation.

He was kindly, forgiving, and charitable in his disposition. He did not bear malice nor cherish resentment. He exemplified the graces of Christian character. He had

A heart within whose sacred cell
The peaceful virtues loved to dwell;
Affection warm and faith sincere
And soft humanity were there.

During the last session of Congress in which he served, it was apparent to his friends that his health was giving way. The decline became more evident and rapid after he returned to his home. He and his family and friends soon realized that he was not long for this world. A short while before his death, in making his last will and testament, he expressed his preparation to meet his God, and has left on record the solace to his loved ones that he was ready for the reward of the Christian. In his home, surrounded by a loving family and sympathizing friends, he fell upon that sleep which knows no waking here, but from which he shall arise refreshed and strengthened, in the great hereafter. With sorrowful hearts and solemn ceremonial we laid all that was mortal of him away in the cemetery of his beloved city, to rest until the resurrection, feeling that in his death a loss irreparable had been sustained by his family, friends, constituency, and country.

Mr. Speaker, it fills me with sadness and, in some degree, a sense of solitude when I recall how many of my friends and colleagues in the Texas delegations with whom I have served from first to last, since I became a member of Congress, have passed away. Coke and Maxey and Hancock and Throckmorton and Stewart and Crain and Cranford and Martin and Kilgore and Culberson and BURKE. I alone am here of those from my State who were in the Forty-eighth Congress. What a harvest the grim reaper has thus gathered! But the sickle will not stop with them, nor cease its work of destruction. Only a little while, and we shall all yield to its cruel stroke, and one by one the names of those now living will be added to the death roll. We should heed the admonitions of our mortality and get ourselves ready for that end which surely awaits us and which we are rapidly approaching. If we live right we shall "die the death of the righteous," as did our lamented colleague, and it may be said of us as we can say of him:

How blest the righteous when he dies,
When sinks a weary soul to rest.
How mildly beam the closing eyes,
How gently heaves the expiring breast!
Life's duty done, as sinks the clay,
Light from its load the spirit flies,
While heaven and earth combine to say
How blest the righteous when he dies!

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, the roll has been called, but no response is made to the name of ROBERT EMMET BURKE, of Texas. A chair is vacant and draped, and another voice is hushed in this great forum. The messenger of the Eternal has passed over the portals of the American House of Representatives. No tumultuous debate breaks the awful silence of the hour. Here partisan wrangle is ended and the conflicts of the living cease, while these walls once again inclose the chamber of the dead. Texas weeps, and the Union sympathizes in her grief. One of her noblest sons has joined the "innumerable caravan in the great beyond."

When He who controls the destinies of men decrees the severance of the ties that bind families, kindred, and friends, and memory recalls the visage of loved ones gone, uniting them with the living in defiance of death, words can not speak the tender emotions that fill the pensive soul and hold it in holy communion with the Creator. Silence and tears are its language, solitude its retreat, and hope and faith in reunion in the immortal unknown its consolation.

When a strong man thus falls in the arena of public life his comrades in the service of the country do well to pause, to meditate, and to speak, that men may know by faithful portrayal the life and character of one who has justly earned the confidence and plaudits of his countrymen, and that the inspiration of such a life may, if it will, lead us in the ways of truth and justice to the achievement of the greatest blessings for mankind.

But fulsome eulogy is mockery of the dead, even as flattery is injustice to the living. If virtues are not to be forgotten, frailties are not to be buried in oblivion. Man is the heir of both, and error, oft-intruding, discloses his weakness; yet, when great and good deeds dominate his nature, character becomes sublime and resplendent, as was demonstrated in the life of ROBERT E. BURKE.

Judge BURKE was born in Tallapoosa County, Ala., in August, 1847. At the age of 16 years he bared his young bosom—heaving with the love of his native South—to the storm of ruthless war in resistance to the invader. He was a private soldier in Company D, Tenth Georgia Cavalry, and served until the close of the struggle between the States.

In 1866 he removed to Texas; was admitted to the bar in 1870; was elected county judge at Dallas in 1878 and twice reelected; was elected judge of the district court at Dallas in 1888 and reelected without opposition in 1892. He was elected to the Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, and Fifty-seventh Congresses. His early education was necessarily neglected. He was a soldier while yet a child—a sentinel on duty in the morning of his youth, true, obedient, and faithful ever. He began the study of law, that greatest and most learned of all professions, without means, uneducated and poorly equipped for such a work, but Celtic blood flowed in the veins of his sound body to nurture his rugged intellect and fire the ambition of his impulsive heart.

Obstacles yielded to his energy, and an honorable professional career was open before him. He was a strong debater, a good lawyer, and a safe counsellor. He quickly discerned the right, and faithfully plead the cause of justice. His administration of the high office of judge of the district court was to his friends and countrymen a source of profound pride and gratification, marked as it was by ability, conservatism, and a rigid adherence to duty in the maintenance of law and order and the rights of citizenship. The verdict of his brethren at the bar is, that he administered the law to the rich and the poor alike, without fear, favor, prejudice, or affection. He was able. He was firm. He was courageous. He loved truth and justice. He was sincere and honest. He knew the law. He loved his fellow-man. These are the essential qualifications of a great judge.

As a Representative in Congress he was wise in legislation and faithful in service, and possessed the highest conception of his duty. His trust in the people was abiding. He believed in the rights of man, and his devotion to republican institutions and constitutional government was supreme.

In the daily walks of life he was affectionate to his friends and considerate of all. He was kind, gentle, and sympathetic. His was a generous friendship that no cold medium knew. Nature made him a gentleman, and so taught him his affinities that he recognized all "kindred spirits." His was a beautiful life of duty to home, country, and God. In the full flower of manhood he falls to sleep in death to awake in eternity.

The dead are like the stars, by day
Withdrawn from mortal eye
But not extinct, they hold their way
In glory through the sky;
Spirits from bondage thus set free
Vanish amidst immensity.
Where human thought like human sight
Fails to pursue their trackless flight.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, this day has heretofore been set apart to pay tribute to the memory, life, and character of ROBERT EMMET BURKE, a former member of this body, who died at his home, in the city of Dallas, State of Texas, on the 5th day of June, 1901, surrounded by a devoted wife, affectionate and loving children, together with hosts of relatives and friends.

ROBERT EMMET BURKE was born in Tallapoosa County, Ala., August 1, 1847. At the tender age of 16 he joined the Confederate Army as a private in Company D, Tenth Georgia Cavalry, and served until the close of the war. He removed to the State of Texas in 1866 and located at Jefferson. He married Miss Henderson, of Cass County, Tex., was admitted to the bar in November, 1870, removed to the city of Dallas in 1871, in which city he resided at the time of his death. He was elected county judge of Dallas County in 1887 and served three consecutive terms; was elected district judge in 1888, and was reelected in 1892 without opposition; was elected to the Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, and Fifty-seventh Congresses by overwhelming majorities. Judge BURKE was an unflinching Democrat.

I never knew him intimately until I met him as a member of the Fifty-sixth Congress. I soon saw that he was a plain, unpretentious, bold, out-spoken, honest man, with the courage of his convictions. He was kind and gentle with his friends; he had a sweet temper and always made himself pleasant and agreeable. He was strictly a temperate man and was always at his post of duty. He was an agreeable, jovial, big-hearted, big-souled, good man. I became very much attached to him. The world was made better by reason of his having lived in it. His devoted wife and three children, a daughter and two sons, survive him. May the great God of us all shield, guide, and protect them, and may his sons emulate his life and character is my sincere wish.

Judge BURKE was a consistent member of the Baptist Church at the date of his death, and had been for years prior thereto. I attended his funeral and heard the pastor of his church testify, in the presence of that large concourse of people that attended his funeral with bowed heads in deep sorrow, that he knew Judge BURKE intimately, and that he was by his bedside during his last illness, and that he had every reason to believe that all was well with Judge BURKE's immortal spirit in the great beyond. What a consolation to his wife, children, and his friends.

Judge BURKE's death should admonish us all "that in the midst of life we are in death."

[Mr. MIERS of Indiana addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, without preparation it is not easy to speak justly of the living or of the dead. Affection is a bad counsellor when it comes to matters of judgment, and the spirit of criticism can be unjust quite as easily as just.

Of the man of whom we speak this afternoon it may be said truthfully, without flattery, and without exaggeration, that he possessed in a large degree the merits of mind and of heart which constitute the nobility of human kind. A brave man, he faced all difficulties and dangers without flinching. An honest man, he knowingly did wrong to no one. A conscientious man, he discharged to the best of his opportunity and ability every duty which presented itself. And that highest of tributes may truthfully be paid to him—he was a just judge.

How much is comprehended in this phrase! How easy it is for one in high judicial position to be swerved by passion or by prejudice to favor a friend or to bear down too hard upon a foe. The rectitude of this man, his integrity of purpose, his lofty disposition to seek the right and shun the wrong, won for him in a conspicuous career upon the bench that loftiest title known to the profession, that noblest of tributes found among men—he was a just judge.

In all the relations of life he was a true man—true to his convictions, true to duty as he saw it, in private life and in public life. He was a generous man. The needy never appealed to him, when he could render assistance, to be turned away bootless. The unfortunate found in him a friend, and when charity was called for the response was ready and liberal.

In the walks of private life, as well as in high station, he met manfully the responsibilities which came upon him. As a statesman he was broad-minded, diligent, and patriotic. Here he fulfilled the duties and requirements of life with a lofty spirit, with affectionate loyalty to the people at home, with a deep love for his country, and with an ardent desire to discharge his whole duty.

That he impressed himself favorably not only upon those who were his friends when he came here, but upon the indifferent and the casual, is in itself a high tribute to his inherent worth. Everybody recognized him as a serious-minded man with honest purposes. Everybody regarded him as planning and working true to his own convictions, determining for himself in such light as beat upon him and upon the questions with which he had to deal what the right was, and then pursuing the course of the right, unflinching, unswerved, unchangeable, whatever the end might be.

We are not speaking in the language of fulsome praise, we are not engaged in meaningless exaltation, when we attribute to this good, just, well-balanced, courageous man the virtues which he possessed. Nor are we indulging merely in platitudes when we express the regret, which must be sincere, for his early taking off. Had his life been spared there were many years of usefulness before him and for his country. He would have reached a high rank in the annals of his country's heroes in civil life had his years been lengthened sufficiently to enable him to work out that which he was capable of doing.

The name given him at the christening seems singularly appropriate. Himself of the sturdy Irish race that has given to the world so many illustrious examples of magnificent manhood and peerless womanhood, he was worthy of such ancestry; and the Christian name which was given to him, "ROBERT EMMET," the name of the noble Irish patriot and martyr, was well borne by the courteous, generous, chivalric, magnanimous BURKE.

For my part, I never can be present on one of these occasions when eulogies are pronounced upon deceased members, I never can be at the portal of the grave, without finding my mind irresistibly drifting on the wings of sublime curiosity, in a hopeful trance, across into that shadowy realm which all of us must enter and from which none of us return.

Of course, this is no time for speculation upon these occult subjects. It is no time for a parading of the disclosures of Revelation. And yet we may wonder whether the soul of our friend, enfranchised, is now felicitating and expanding in a brighter and more gorgeous realm, far, far away—immeasurably distant from us—or whether he lives and grows close by, his spirit, now freed from the clogs of earth, hovering about us and lending us encouragement and inspiration.

In the great advances of science is it possible that some time—not in our day, but in the days of our children, or in the more distant years to come—the exact location of the soul in the human body will be found; that the analysis of that which has escaped all analyses heretofore, outside of the Divine laboratory, may be made; that human beings may understand, as never they understood before, and that revelation may come to the individual and through the individual, as now it only comes drifting down with the current of the ages and from the Sacred Book? Of these things we know not; but it is a comforting thought, it is an exalting aspiration, that the spirits of the good, who have striven here upon the earth and have scattered blessings as they went through this life, do find and must find an existence far grander and greater in the immeasurable world, in the limitless time expanded into eternity, beyond the portals of the grave, over which now we drop, humbly and reverently, our tribute of respect.

Mr. BALL of Texas; Mr. Speaker, it is with some diffidence that, without other preparation than personal knowledge of his character, I attempt to pay tribute to the memory of my deceased friend, Judge ROBERT EMMET BURKE. I feel that it would be impossible for me, with patient care and thoughtfully chosen language, to do justice to his memory, and yet I would not do myself justice, knowing him as I did, enjoying his friendship during his life, and cherishing his memory now that he has gone to his last rest, if I failed in this presence to say at least a few words expressing, however feebly, that which my heart fain would voice.

Judge BURKE was a native of that splendid Commonwealth, Alabama, a State which has enriched the history of Texas by the aid of her pioneers in the settlement of the then Mexican province, by the deeds of her heroic sons upon battlefields for the independence of Texas, and whose citizens have woven their history into our jurisprudence and civil life in the upbuilding of our beloved State of Texas. At the age of 16 Judge BURKE enlisted as a private soldier in the Confederate army.

He was not a general, not a colonel, he held no rank, but he belonged to that great body of the soldiers of the Confederacy who stand to-day in history as the concrete expression of the sublimest words in the English language—duty, service, and sacrifice.

Their deeds and his are not of individual record in the annals of war, as are the deeds of those in command.

Their fame is rather like the Milky Way, which tracks its luminous path athwart the spacious heavens, whose untold myriads of stars by their individual brightness obscure each other's light, and yet blended each in all create the magnificent arch whose soft nebulous brightness stands out with more than planetary beauty, a wonderful and glorious whole.

While history may be silent as to his soldierly deeds, knowing him, we know that as a private soldier he well discharged his duty in camp, upon the march, and in "the red blaze of battle," for fidelity to every trust was his watchword through life. No sick or wounded comrade was denied his ministering care, for charity and goodness of heart were his crowning characteristics, and the good Samaritan was not more ready and thoughtful than was he.

Mr. Speaker, if "kind hearts are more than coronets," if doing goods things to mankind as we go along the journey of life are to be laid up in that "mansion eternal in the heavens," then the numberless kind words and gracious deeds with which our friend gladdened so many hearts must long ago have blossomed into flowers of beauty to garland the rock of ages.

Judge BURKE was a plain man of the people—sometimes called the common people. He was one of them; he loved them; he knew them in his and their daily life; his sympathies were with them; not as that pretended sympathy which goes out from the demagogue who seeks to deceive the people for his own ulterior purpose, but as one of whom it can be said above all other things that he loved his fellow-man. His constituents knew it, and, consequently, when he offered for political preferment at their hands he was invincible before the people, who loved and trusted him. He was a devout and earnest Christian man; not one who went about "striking himself upon the breast and thanking God that he was not as other men," not the "holier than thou" kind, for his religion was never obtrusive. He did not go about as a mentor, to rebuke or to criticize those whose conduct was not such as he perhaps would approve; but by kind words of counsel, by the influence of his own example, he went about doing good among his fellow-men, and increased the respect and reverence for the holy gospel, which he professed simply by the silent forcefulness of his own personal example.

It was my good fortune when Judge BURKE and myself entered Congress at the same time to live under the same roof with him for months, and to learn to know him as he was. No man ever came to Congress who was more faithful to his constituents, not only in the greater field of activities in national life, but in the little things that go to make up the sum of the duties of a member of this body. There was not a constituent in his district so humble, there was not a widow that was so poor, there was no pensioner from the Army against which he fought that had so little influence but that he or she could command the service of Judge BURKE at all times and in all honorable ways. He did not leave it to his private secretary to transact the business of his constituents with the Government departments, but went in person; and I have no doubt during his service in Congress he gave a greater portion of his time to the details which his position imposed upon him than almost any member of Congress for a similar period of time.

I will not enlarge upon my personal regard. I do not desire to be fulsome. Modest in his character and in his disposition, I know that if our dead friend could look down upon us to-day he would far rather that we did him less than justice than say anything that might savor of fulsome or unmerited praise. It can not be said of him, the sentence can not be passed upon him, that "he knew his duty and did it not." But it can be truthfully said that as a citizen, as a soldier, as a judge in the disputes of others, as a member of Congress, as father, as husband, and as friend, that everywhere and at all times Judge BURKE did his full duty as he saw it, and he did it with all the zeal and ability which he possessed. That he should have been cut off in the very flower of his usefulness, to our finite minds is unaccountable; but it is not ours to question the ways of Providence or to say that a man in the zenith of his career should not be taken away. He had no dread of death. Sustained by the principles of the Christian religion, having an experimental knowledge of the value of the golden rule and the Sermon on the Mount by faith and practice during his life, the shadows of death did not appall him.

From the presence of his devoted wife and children he could look out with larger vision and go before, conscious that—

> Death is another life; we bow our heads
> At going out; we think, and enter straight
> Another golden chamber of the King's,
> Larger than this we leave and lovelier.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, when Judge BURKE, my fellow-member of this House, my friend and comrade, died, this House lost a conspicuous and able member. ROBERT EMMET BURKE'S devotion to his family, his clean and upright character, his industry and public spirit made him the idol of his Congressional district, and his services here were greatly appreciated and generally approved by them.

Mr. BURKE was a kind, tender-hearted man. Well do I remember how tenderly he watched by the bedside of one of our fellow-members from Texas, the noble, brilliant, and generous John W. Cranford, who, after a long illness, died in a hospital in this city during the Fifty-fifth Congress. We often visited our stricken comrade together and ministered in every way possible to his wants, but he sank rapidly until his spirit departed; and it was during these trying hours that I learned more than ever before to love and respect Mr. BURKE.

Little did I think that my kind, noble, generous friend, BURKE, would be the next one of our delegation to fall asleep and pass serenely into rest on the other shore of that mysterious sea that never yet bore on any wave the images of a homeward sail. But he is dead.

> He gave his honors to the world again,
> His blessed part to heaven, and slept in peace.

To us it is incomprehensible why death claimed this kind husband, good father, and generous friend just at a time when he was serving his country so well and faithfully, when he was in the prime of his mature manhood and in the midst of gratifying achievements for his constituents.

Man's finite mind can not fathom these mysteries. Man indeed proposes, but God alone disposes; and we shall know nothing of the mysteries of death or why our friends and loved ones are taken from us until the Divine Hand shall have withdrawn the veil which shields the portals of heaven from mortal gaze.

We deeply sympathize with the bereaved family of our departed friend, and we hope that the consolation of his religious faith and the healing balm of time will soon bridge the gulf of sorrow caused by the death of the husband and father. His was a noble Christian character, and his life should be studied and emulated by his sons, and by all of the young men who knew him. To know him was to appreciate him, and those who knew him best appreciated him most.

Whether we view R. E. BURKE as a poor young man struggling to educate himself, or as a soldier of the lost cause fighting for his beloved South, or as a briefless young lawyer striving to build up a practice, or as a judge on the bench dispensing justice and equity to his fellow-men, or as a statesman representing his district in Congress, we always, under all circumstances and conditions, find him the same honest, noble-hearted Christian gentleman. To the young and rising generation he has been a living example of what can be accomplished by a poor boy under the most adverse circumstances. He has taught them by example that—

> Honor and shame from no condition rise;
> Act well your part, there all the honor lies.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, on this occasion, when the friends of the departed, gathered around his spiritual bier, are commemorating his life and character, permit me, sir, to add my humble tribute of respect and regard to the many sincere and eloquent testimonials which have been offered. Those of you who knew him well in his social and domestic life; those of you from his own State with whom he labored in constructing the laws and developing the resources of that great and promising Commonwealth; those of you, perhaps, with whom he marched and bivouacked, fought and suffered throughout the terrible conflict of the civil war, can speak with knowledge and appreciation of his trials and vicissitudes, his joys and sorrows, his efforts and achievements.

My association with him was comparatively brief, but around that association are clustered many pleasant recollections. He was born and reared in the South, I in the North. We first met two years ago as members of the Contested Elections Committee. His genial disposition first impressed me, and our informal acquaintance soon developed into friendship. Without obtrusiveness or tendency to display his attainments, I gradually learned to esteem him as a man and admire him as a lawyer and legislator. His manners were gentle, quiet, and unassuming. His heart was warm, affectionate, and generous. His character was sensitive, refined, and pure. He was not forward or aggressive in a place where push and self-assertion seemed to count for much. While he was a man of clear views and decided convictions, in defense of which he was always prepared, and was not disposed to compromise with what he considered wrong, yet he recognized the right in others to entertain contrary opinions and gave them credit for honesty of heart and sincerity of purpose.

From natural bent and long experience on the bench, his mind was well poised. It was judicial rather than forensic. His style was logical rather than rhetorical. He took his position and hewed to the line. He was not disposed to do violence to the facts or his own judgment in order that he might create a sensation or turn a gracefully rounded period. He loved Texas, as all Texans do. In season and out of season he espoused its cause and earnestly and loyally championed the interests of his constituents. He impressed me as serious and rather old in manners beyond his years. Possibly ill health and a warning of approaching disease affected his disposition. He died many years before the allotted time, in the midst of a career of activity and usefulness. In the decease of ROBERT EMMET BURKE, his State lost one of its most prudent, faithful, honorable citizens, his country one of its most capable, reliable, and honest legislators.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, never, during my ten years' service here, have we returned and reopened this House without meeting a somber gloom, caused by some seat being muffled with crape, nor without having the opening prayer saddened by the Chaplain's lamenting the recurrence of fatalities to some one elected to these seats.

How strange that the reaper so often drops his sickle where least expected and garners the unripe stalks and leaves the maturer ones standing.

How many of us would have eagerly changed the chances of longevity with the deceased when we last separated.

Judge ROBERT EMMET BURKE was of that equable, judicial, conservative temperament, ever striving to reduce everything around him to a complete equilibrium, and was ever seeking to move in complete harmony with natural laws, and yet he untimely falls upon the way, while the less vigilant contravenors of the harmonious laws of their being recklessly and defiantly pass on unscathed.

The vicissitudes and accidents of nature are as uncertain and as "erratic as the phantasm of a morning dream."

No one has an assurance of one additional moment here. A mite from an atom of cheese, an invisible mote floating in a sun ray, may strike down the young or the old, the pigmy or the giant, with apparently equal ease.

If the spirit of man, that matchless preserver, in fact, the only embalming fluid that can preserve life and action in this ephemeral body, does, when released, join the forces of nature, and goes on performing the high functions for which it qualified itself when in the body, then we know that of the lamented Judge BURKE will be among the most exalted of this unknown realm.

His every act here was directed toward the amelioration of the hard conditions of his fellow-citizens, whether in his active conduct in legislation, or measured by his deportment toward employee and associate, whether in high or low position.

His quiet and dignified deportment here begot for him a like deferential treatment from all, from the Speaker of the House to the bootblack in the toilet room.

The classifier of men would attribute him to the best type of what is known as the judicial temperament. This is but a brief way of saying that he was unselfish; that he was void of a blinding prejudice; that he could see and detect good or evil equally in friend or foe; that he took the Golden Rule as the measure of his course of action. Such exemplary characters as the deceased leave a void that is indeed difficult to fill and always sorely lamented.

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those who have addressed the House be allowed to extend their remarks in the RECORD, if they so desire, and that those who have not spoken but desire to contribute memorials to Judge BURKE may be permitted to print in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LANHAM). The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that those gentlemen who have spoken to-day may have the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD; also, that other members who may desire to do so may print remarks in the RECORD on the life and character of the late Judge BURKE. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

And then (at 2 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House, in pursuance of the resolution, adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock meridian.

Washington, D. C., February 10, 1902.

To the Fifty-seventh Congress:

In behalf of the Industrial Commission I have the honor to submit herewith its final report. This is Volume XIX and is devoted to historical reviews of the subjects of our inquiries, and to recommendations for legislation, with appendixes relating thereto.

It presents a substantially complete epitome of the industrial life of the nation and of the important changes in business methods which have taken place in recent years, with a discussion of some of the economic problems which confront the people.

It may not be inappropriate to call attention to certain features of our reports, which we hope will make them convenient to members of Congress and to legislators in the several States, and also to economists and business men throughout the country.

In the first place it was the aim of the Commission to select only the most competent witnesses, although, of course, there were, in the nearly 700 examined, a few who sought to be heard, and some of them, perhaps, for personal as well as public reasons. As a rule, however, the evidence is that of the chief men in business or the heads of business departments, public officials, leaders of organized labor, and experts who have given the subjects exhaustive study.

Having obtained such instructive testimony, it was the next purpose of the Commission to present it in accessible and attractive form: therefore each of the volumes of testimony opens with a narrative review of its substance. This is followed by a digest of the evidence, usually about one-fourth the length of the evidence itself, arranged under topical heads and giving reference to the pages of the testimony and cross references to other evidence on authorities on the same subject. In addition, each volume contains an index of the digest and an index of the testimony, prepared in accordance with the latest and best approved library rules, while the final volume contains an index of its contents and a general index for all the volumes, by means of which quick and sure guidance can be had to all the information presented. Some of these features are unique in Government reports and have been highly commended by economists at home and abroad.

Besides taking testimony the Commission has availed itself of much other authentic information, gathered chiefly from official documents of the nation and the States, from the decisions of courts, and from the researches of experts. Thus a person who seeks knowledge as to the history and latest status of any of the subjects covered can find it in condensed but accurate terms in these volumes without taking the trouble to find and read the many publications from which it has been gleaned. In view of the size of the country and the voluminous nature of the legislation and reports of its forty-five States, and of the many organizations which represent industrial progress, this compendium should prove of service to busy men.

Any reader of the reviews in this final volume can not but be impressed with the immensity and complexity of the industrial life of the nation and with the fact that nearly all kinds of business have undergone almost revolutionary changes in recent years. It would now seem impossible to legislate wisely or to conduct business prudently without obtaining knowledge of these new conditions. It is not presumptuous to say that most students of these reports will find many revelations of business methods and complications of which they knew little before and will have a liberal education in the economic problems of the day.

Possibly a word will be pardoned in reference to the publication and distribution of the volumes. For some months past the demands for them from all over the country and from foreign countries has been so great that regrets are expressed that larger editions were not printed. Doubtless Senators and Representatives have generally sent their allotments to libraries, which will serve the public fairly well so far as all but the final volume is concerned; but as this volume is substantially complete of itself and embraces summaries and conclusions drawn from its predecessors, probably the publication of a very large edition for a much more general and popular distribution would prove to be a profitable and commendable use of public funds.

The Commission regrets that lack of time prevented it from taking testimony in the States on the Pacific coast, now such an important part of the country, and from investigating many branches of industry and some of the newest combinations in sections which it partially covered. It especially regrets its inability to complete an investigation of telegraph systems and proposed Government ownership and of the American merchant marine in the foreign trade. The country has become so vast and its industries so varied and changeable that a bureau in a permanent department of the Government would have all it could do to keep trace of the mutations of business, a subject which is quite apart from the scientific and statistical work now well performed by other bureaus and departments.

The Commission acknowledges with gratitude courtesies received from officials in various departments of the Government and in many of the States, and takes pleasure in testifying to the fidelity of its entire corps of assistants, especially to the valuable aid rendered by most of its expert agents, particularly by its accomplished secretary, Mr. Edward Dana Durand, and by Messrs. F. J. Stimson, J. W. Jenks, William Z. Ripley, John Franklin Crowell, John R. Commons, Max West, and Charles E. Edgerton.

In conclusion, it should be said that the duty which the law devolved upon the Commission, to recommend legislation, has been performed with becoming modesty and without a thought that importance will be attached to its suggestions except so far as they are the results of a careful study of the subjects. The signatures of commissioners apply to the recommendations only, and no commissioner who has signed is necessarily committed to the statements, reasoning, or language of the several reviews which precede the recommendations. It is believed that the conclusions as a whole are based upon a fair balance of evidence, and it is hoped that they will be of service to members of Congress and legislatures in shaping laws to the many new conditions which these reports present.

Respectfully submitted.

EUGENE HALE,
W. B. ALLISON,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. CANNON,
S. S. BARNEY,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HALE. There are only two items for further conference. One is amendment numbered 1 on page 2, relating to the claim of the Mexican Government for a repayment of money in our Treasury. The House conferees were not prepared to agree to this proposition without submitting it first to the House.

The other amendments are those in relation to State claims. While recognizing the force of the Senate proposition, as they are of considerable amount and have never been before the House, the conferees on the part of the House declined to agree to them and desired to submit these amendments to the House itself, which will be done.

Almost all the other amendments of the Senate have been agreed to by the House conferees. There is a provision which regulates the auditing of the contingent fund of the House on which the conferees on both sides were in accord. Aside from that the bill goes to the House. After the report has been accepted I shall ask that the Senate insist on its amendments relating to the Mexican claim and the State claims and ask for a further conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the report?

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments not agreed to and ask for a further conference with the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of Senate; and Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. TELLER were appointed.

STATUTES DEFINING TREASON, SEDITION, ETC.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, a few days ago we had a very interesting debate in the Senate in regard to the statute defining treason, sedition, and misprision of treason, and providing penalties therefor. As a result of that discussion and what was then developed I called on the law officer of the Division of Insular Affairs of the War Department to make a compilation of the statute in question and other statutes enacted by the United States and the various States of the Union on that subject. He has furnished it to me, and I ask that it may be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. BACON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3509) to transfer the PERMANENT CENSUS OFFICE.

Mr. QUARLES. I am directed by the Committee on the Census, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10308) to provide for a permanent Census Office to report it with amendments and to submit a report thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. QUARLES. In connection with the report, I desire to make a request.

While the committee were considering this permanent census bill we were overwhelmed with applications for hearings regarding the matter of civil service. We were unable to hear the distinguished gentlemen who wished to appear and requested them to present their arguments in writing. They did so, but too late to be considered by the committee. Therefore, out of deference to those gentlemen, I ask that their communication, which is short, may be printed as a public document for the consideration of the Senate during the pendency of this measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

REPORTS ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, by request of the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are no copies now in the document room of Report No. 1 of his committee of the present session of Congress or of Report No. 1337 of the Fifty-sixth Congress, and I ask, at his request, for a reprint of these documents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington, from the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, asks unanimous consent for a reprint of Report No. 1 of the present Congress and Report No. 1337 of the Fifty-sixth Congress. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CONSIDERATION OF CALENDAR ON FRIDAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, an order has been made for the delivery of eulogies on Friday next at 4 o'clock. I rise to ask unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock on that day an hour may be given to the consideration of the Calendar, unobjected private pension bills, and bills to correct the military records of soldiers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that on Friday next at 3 o'clock one hour may be devoted to the consideration of unobjected pension bills and bills to correct military records. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PENSIONS TO SURVIVORS OF INDIAN WARS.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 640, which I think will lead to no debate. It has been passed by the Senate three or four times heretofore.

Mr. LODGE. I am not going to object to the Senator's bill, but I give notice that when that bill shall have been disposed of I shall then move to proceed to the consideration of the Philippine tariff bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read for the full information of the Senate, subject to objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill (S. 640) to extend the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war," approved July 27, 1892; but before concluding, was interrupted by—

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it will be impossible to pass that bill by unanimous consent. I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island objects.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will not object to the consideration of the bill. It has heretofore passed the Senate three or four times; it has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Pensions; and there is no more meritorious bill pending in the Senate to-day than this very bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. But, confessedly, it will take several million dollars a year out of the Treasury if it should become a law, and it certainly ought not to be passed without explanation and without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island objects.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that the objection which has been made may not prejudice the bill, but that it may retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before that matter passes from the consideration of the Senate I want to correct a suggestion I made to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. He asked me quietly how much this bill would probably cost the Government, and I think I suggested two or three million dollars. I wish to say that several years ago, when a report was made by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, it was then ascertained that the cost for the first year—and these are the very figures supplied by the Commissioner of Pensions—would be approximately $730,000; but many of these are very old men and a good many have died since then. I should think it likely that it might cost half a million dollars the first year, and that it would be wiped out in the course of five or six years.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the bill should go over to another session, it would cost nothing. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will look into the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will examine it.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator does examine it, I think he will withdraw his objection.

PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to give notice that at some early day, without undue interruption of the existing business, I shall ask the Senate to take up the constitutional amendment reported this morning, changing the time for the termination of the Presidential term and the terms of Senators and Representatives.

A similar joint resolution passed the Senate once, and, I think, two or three times before. It is quite important, as it must be submitted to the State legislatures, that it should go to the other House very soon. I will not fix any time now, but I will at an early day, probably at some time in the last few days of the present week, ask to have the joint resolution taken up for consideration.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of what is known as the Philippine tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Could not the Senator from Massachusetts allow us to have half an hour or an hour on the Calendar regularly? There are many Senators who desire the consideration of bills.

Mr. LODGE. I dislike to refuse anything the Senator from Missouri asks, and I should be glad to get to the Calendar, but until this bill is moved on—I yielded on Friday, when we adjourned over, and I think this bill ought to be promptly disposed of—I can not yield to any request.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SPOKANE, WASH.

Mr. TURNER. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], before proceeding with the discussion of the Philippine tariff bill, to extend his good nature to the point of consenting to the consideration of a bill which will give rise to no debate. It is a short bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Washington has the floor on the Philippine tariff bill, and, of course, I make no objection.

Mr. TURNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1447) providing for the erection of a public building at the city of Spokane, in the State of Washington.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other governmental offices in the city of Spokane and State of Washington, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, not to exceed the sum of $500,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the results of said examination and of his recommendation thereon, and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to the said proposed sites.

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites, and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall within thirty days after such examination make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

The compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Spokane, in the State of Washington."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. MCKENNEY, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9315) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes; recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, and 77, and agrees to the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9315) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes, numbered 1, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, and 77, and receding from its disagreement to amendment numbered 78 with an amendment in lieu of the amendment to insert the following:

And the claims of like character arising under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat., p. 276), and joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stat., p. 615), as interpreted and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the State of New York against the United States, decided January 6, 1896 (160 U. S. Reports, p. 598), not heretofore allowed, or heretofore disallowed, by the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be reopened, examined, and allowed, and if deemed necessary shall be transmitted to the Court of Claims for findings of fact or determination of disputed questions of law to aid in the settlement of the claims by the accounting officers.

Mr. HALE. The amendment only defines the kind of claims. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The amendment was concurred in.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, I believe that I will, at this time, conclude the introduction of documentary evidence in the great cause of human liberty versus Republican perfidy and dishonor, in order that I may proceed without further interruption to draw the deductions from the law and the facts which seem to be authorized and necessary.

On Friday last I inserted as part of my remarks a series of proclamations and decrees relating to the establishment of a revolutionary government in the Philippine Islands after the Philippine leaders had been brought back to the islands by our war ships, and I now again call attention to some of them.

One of these was Aguinaldo's proclamation, issued May 24, 1898, the very day that Aguinaldo landed at Cavite, establishing a dictatorial government. As bearing on that act, I also introduced a letter from Mr. Wildman, our consul at Hongkong, to the Secretary of State, showing that he had consulted with Aguinaldo before he left Hongkong concerning the establishment of this dictatorial government; that, in his opinion, it was necessary for Aguinaldo to proceed in that manner, and that he (Wildman) had concerted with Aguinaldo the very terms of the proclamation which Aguinaldo issued.

I also inserted the testimony of General Whittier, given before our Peace Commission at Paris, to the effect that after Aguinaldo had issued this proclamation he became discouraged because the accessions to his ranks were slow, thought of throwing up his connection with the insurrection, and was persuaded by Admiral Dewey to continue his efforts.

I also inserted a proclamation and decree extending this dictatorial and revolutionary government and laying down rules for the conduct of civil government in the several provinces of the islands. This proclamation was dated June 18, 1898.

On the 6th day of August, 1898, the representatives of the people of the islands met at Cavite, adopted a formal declaration of independence from Spain, and formally established what they then called a revolutionary government as contradistinguished from the dictatorial government which had before that been established by Aguinaldo. The papers showing these acts I also introduced into the record. This was all before the fall of Manila, and all in face of and with the knowledge of our naval and military commanders. I now want to call the attention of the Senate to a further and important act in the evolution of Filipino government.

On the 21st of January, 1899, before the adoption of the peace treaty between this country and Spain, and consequently before any pretense of the cession of the Philippines to us, the representatives of all the Christian people in all the islands of the archipelago met at Malolos, established the Philippine republic, and adopted a constitution which would be a model for any people in the world.

This act took place, as I say, on January 21, 1899. I have before me Document No. 208, of the Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, in which, commencing at page 107 of that document, I find this constitution printed in full. I shall not ask to insert it as part of my remarks because of its very great length, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to its character and to some of its provisions. It commences thus:

We, the representatives of the Philippine people, lawfully invoked, in order to establish justice, provide for common defense, promote general welfare, and insure the benefits of freedom, imploring the aid of the Sovereign Legislator of the Universe in order to attain these purposes, have voted, decreed, and sanctioned the following

POLITICAL CONSTITUTION.

In the body of the instrument provision is made for establishing the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the government, the legislative and executive departments being free and popular and their members elected by the Filipino people, and the officers of the judicial department appointed by the legislature. The first title of this constitution is in these words:

FIRST TITLE.—THE REPUBLIC.

ARTICLE 1. The political association of all the Filipinos constitutes a nation, the estate of which is denominated Philippine republic.

ART. 2. The Philippine republic is free and independent.

ART. 3. Sovereignty resides exclusively in the people.

SECOND TITLE—THE GOVERNMENT.

ART. 4. The government of the republic is popular, representative, alternative, and responsible, and is exercised by three distinct powers, which are denominated legislative, executive, and judicial. Two or more of these powers shall never be vested in one person or corporation; neither shall the legislature be vested in one individual alone.

THIRD TITLE—RELIGION.

ART. 5. The State recognizes the equality of all religious worships and the separation of the church and the state.

Then follows the bill of rights of this constitution, to which I wish to call briefly the attention of the Senate.

ART. 7. No Filipinos nor foreigner shall be arrested nor imprisoned unless on account of crime and in accordance with the laws. (S. C., 4th art.)

ART. 8. Any person arrested shall be discharged or delivered over to the judicial authority within twenty-four hours following the arrest. (S. C., 4th art.)

Any arrest shall be held without effect or shall be carried to commitment within seventy-two hours after the detained has been delivered over to a competent judge.

The party interested shall receive notice of the order which may be issued within the same time. (S. C., 4th art.)

ART. 9. No Filipino can become a prisoner unless by virtue of the mandate of a competent judge.

The decree by which may be issued the mandate shall be ratified or confirmed, having heard the presumed criminal within seventy-two hours following the act of commitment. (S. C., 5th art.)

ART. 10. No one can enter the domicile of a Filipino or foreign resident in the Philippines without his consent, except in urgent cases of fire, flood, earthquake, or other similar danger, or of unlawful aggression proceeding from within or in order to assist a person within calling for help.

Outside of these cases, the entrance in the domicile of a Filipino or foreign resident of the Philippines and the searching of his papers or effects can only be decreed by a competent judge and executed during the day.

ART. 14. No Filipino shall be prosecuted nor sentenced, unless by a judge or tribunal to whom, by virtue of the laws which precede the crime, is delegated its cognizance, and in the form which the latter prescribe. (S. C., 16th art.)

ART. 15. Any person detained or imprisoned without the legal formalities, unless in the cases provided in this constitution, shall be discharged upon their own petition or that of any Filipino.

The laws shall determine the form of proceeding summarily in this case, as well as the personal and pecuniary penalties incurred by him who may order, execute, or cause to be executed the illegal detention or imprisonment.

ART. 16. No person shall be deprived temporarily or permanently of his property or rights, nor disturbed in the possession of them, unless by virtue of a judicial sentence. (S. C., 10th art.)

ART. 19. No Filipino who may be in the full enjoyment of his civil and political rights shall be hindered in the free exercise of the same.

ART. 20. Neither shall any Filipino be deprived of:

1. The right of expressing liberally his ideas and opinions, either by word or by writing, availing himself of the press or of any other similar means.

2. The right of associating himself with all the objects of human life which may not be contrary to public morality; and, finally,

3. Of the right to direct petitions, individually or collectively, to the public powers and to the authorities.

ART. 23. Any Filipino can found and maintain establishments of instruction or of education, in accordance with the provisions which are established.

Popular education shall be obligatory and gratuitous in the schools of the nation. (S. C., 12th art.)

ART. 28. The enumeration of the rights granted in this title does not imply the prohibition of any other not expressly delegated.

It is impossible for any person to read this admirable charter of government without coming to the conclusion that the men who framed it were well fitted for self-government. In the division of governmental powers and in the character of the powers conferred on the several coordinate departments of the government it is modeled after our own Constitution and shows close and intelligent study of that instrument. In its just appreciation of civil and religious liberty, and in the provisions for the securing of the same, and in the safeguards thrown around person and property, as well as in the provisions made in the interest of education, it shows an advanced conception of liberty and of rational government of which any people in the world might well be proud.

This constitution established by the Filipinos was not a mere paper constitution, as has been claimed, nor was the republic which they established a shadowy and intangible republic.

At the time the treaty of peace with Spain became of force this constitution and this republic were then and for months before that time had been receiving the hearty, loyal, enthusiastic support of over 6,000,000 Christian people in the islands.

So far as the island of Luzon is concerned, which contains over 4,000,000 of these Christian people, I find the fact which I have stated established by a report made to Admiral Dewey by two naval officers—Leonard and Wilcox—who spent the months of September and October, 1898, traveling through the island of Luzon, and who reported to the Admiral that the revolutionary government of the Filipinos was maintaining peace and order there, and was receiving the loyal support of all the people of that island outside of the city of Manila.

Mr. Sargent, in a series of magazine articles published at a later period, amplified the facts stated in this report to Admiral Dewey. The articles, as well as the report, are printed here as Document No. 66.

As to the island of Panay, which has more than a million of these Christian people, I find the fact which I have stated established by the correspondence between General Miller, the commandant of our forces before Iloilo, and the officials of the revolutionary government then in possession of that island, who held General Miller with his troops on board of his vessels in front of that island for more than seventy days, declining to permit him to take possession of the island in the name of the United States, because they claimed that the Filipino people had established their own government, which was in possession of the island, and that to permit the United States to take possession of it would be in derogation of the authority of that government.

I find the same thing established as to the island of Cebu by the correspondence had with the native officials when our naval force appeared before that island and undertook to take possession of it. The authorities of the revolutionary government there protested stoutly against our Government taking possession of that island, because they said it was in the possession of and owed its allegiance to the Filipino Republic, and to permit the United States to take possession would be in derogation of the rights of that Republic.

I shall not read this correspondence nor these letters of Messrs. Sargent and Wilcox, nor their report to Admiral Dewey, but the parts of the letters of Leonard and Wilcox and of their report which I wish inserted are found in Senate Document 66, at pages 1, 2, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 15, 16, 22, 23, 27, 36, 41, 42. The correspondence in front of Iloilo is found in Senate Document No. 208, commencing at page 52 of that document. The correspondence before Cebu is also found in Document 208, at page 148.

I ask leave of the Senate to include in my remarks extracts from these several documents without reading them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, if there was any doubt about the effect of this documentary proof which I have offered, it would be set at rest by what I shall now read to the Senate, namely, a part of the report of General Otis to the Adjutant-General for the year 1899. In that report, commencing at page 75, speaking about the Filipino insurgent government, General Otis says:

Repeated efforts were made to secure some mark of recognition for their government from the American authorities, some of which appeared to be quite cunningly devised. I was addressed by so-called ministers of state on diplomatic subjects, and was visited by accredited members of the Malolos government.

The various foreign consuls resident in Manila were officially informed by this Government of its proceedings and furnished with copies of its so-called decrees. Never since the time Aguinaldo returned to Cavite in May of 1898 and placed himself under the masterful spirit of Mabini had he the slightest intention to accept the kind offices and assistance of the United States, except as they might be employed to hold Spain throttled while he worked the scheme of self-aggrandizement. His success was not in the least astonishing, as after the various islands had driven out the few remaining and discouraged soldiers of their openly declared enemy, they naturally turned to Luzon for some form of central government, the islands of the south being well aware of their inability to maintain successful separate and distinct political establishments.

The crude one in process of formation in central Luzon offered itself through its visiting agents and was accepted in part (notwithstanding race animosities and divergent business interests) and very probably because no other alternative was offered. The eight months of opportunity given the ambitious Tagalo by the hold on Spain which the United States maintained was sufficient also for him to send his troops and designing men into the distant provinces and hold the unarmed natives in subjection while he imposed military authority, and thus in December, 1898, we find in northern and southeastern Luzon, in Mindoro, Samar, Leyte, Panay, and even on the coast of Mindanao and in some of the smaller islands, the aggressive Tagalo, present in person, and whether civilian or soldier, supreme in authority.

The islands mentioned by General Otis in this report where the ambitious Tagalo was found to be in supreme and undisputed authority and control are Mindoro, with a population of 70,296; Samar, with a population of 250,062; Leyte, with a population of 285,495; Mindanao, with a population of 191,802; Panay, with a population of 1,052,586; Luzon, with a population of 4,467,982; making a total of 6,317,982 people.

It is idle for anybody to say that these people are savages, or that they are not reasonably well fitted for self-government. A claim of that kind is a dishonorable imputation upon the United States, because she employed these people as her allies in the war with Spain. Moreover, it is conclusively shown to be untrue by the reports of our officers there, from some of which reports I have already introduced excerpts, and from all of which, or nearly all, I might quote if time and space permitted; but I will content myself on that point with asking leave to insert in the RECORD, without reading, an article by Howard W. Bray, who for fourteen years was a resident of the Philippine Islands, and was well acquainted with the people, their character, and their capabilities, which letter I find in Document No. 62, at page 349.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCOMAS in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and leave is granted.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, the evidences I have now produced show that at the time of the outbreak of our war with Spain the Filipino people were themselves carrying on a struggle against Spain and that back of and behind that struggle was the desire of the Filipinos for independence, and that our naval, military, and diplomatic officers, being aware of these facts, with the knowledge of the higher heads of Government, incited that people to continue and to augment their struggle and to assist us in expelling Spain from the archipelago. Not a word, or a syllable, or a whisper was ever communicated to them that we ourselves harbored designs inimical to their independence. A number of our agents gave them what, under the circumstances, must be considered as most unequivocal declarations to the contrary. Others were sedulous that no word or letter should be written or spoken to the contrary, even after they had become aware that we did in fact harbor such designs.

Knowing well what their purpose was, we brought their leaders back to the islands in our war ships. We furnished them and their people with money and arms and equipments and munitions of war. We urged them to rise, to organize, to fight, and to die in behalf of Philippine liberty and independence. And they did fight and die in that cause to such purpose that they had killed or captured or driven within the defenses of the city of Manila every Spanish soldier on the island, with a few insignificant exceptions, before the arrival there of a single, solitary American soldier.

After the arrival of our forces we cooperated with them in pushing the siege of Manila. We shared with them the lines of circumvallation which they had drawn and intrenched around that city. Our soldiers stood shoulder to shoulder with theirs in skirmish and in battle. Our blood mingled with theirs on the ground around that city, spilled in a common struggle, and finally, largely through their efforts and not ours, as a result of their victorious achievements before we even appeared upon the ground, the city of Manila surrendered, and the power of Spain in those islands was broken and destroyed and gone forever.

We have had controversy whether the Filipino people technically, in an international sense, were our allies in the war with Spain. I care nothing about that, although undoubtedly, in my opinion, they were our allies in every sense of the word. But there is one thing about which there has never been any controversy and about which there can be no controversy. We did seek their aid in the war with Spain. They did give us their aid in that war. They were ignorant of any purpose on our part inimical to their aspirations. We, on the other hand, knew full well what their aspirations were, and that they were nothing short of or less than full and complete independence for the Filipino people.

This being so, is it not monstrous and atrocious and unheard of that we should seek to seize their country, without their consent and against their protest, as the spoil of the war with Spain—their war as well as ours? No nation in all the history of the world ever before did such an act. Show me one, and I will withdraw all I have said on this subject. It can not be done.

The truth is that the leaders of the Republican party have dishonored the nation in their greed for power and spoils, and they have been engaged ever since in endeavoring to lull its conscience to sleep with the false and blasphemous pretense that they were serving Almighty God by advancing liberty and religion.

Instead of advancing liberty they have struck it the most damaging blow that it has received since it first found a foothold on the American continent. They have stultified all its pretensions and have weakend its hold on the affections of mankind. They have made it possible to say of this nation, for more than a century the exemplar of liberty throughout the world—

Alas! could she but fully, truly, know
How her great name is now throughout abhorred;
How eager all the earth is for the blow
Which shall lay bare her bosom to the sword;
How all the nations deem her their worst foe,
That worse than worst of foes, the once adored
False friend, who held out freedom to mankind,
And now would chain them to the very mind.

Liberty from this time forth will advance slowly if it does not retrograde. And if the leaders of the Republican party be permitted to revolutionize our Government by ingrafting on it the principles of imperialism involved in colonial conquest and colonial government, liberty not only will not advance, but it will retrograde, and will involve in irremediable ruin and disaster free institutions everywhere—in Asia, in Europe, in Africa, and in America. And if they can have their own way they will revolutionize the Government. They have apparently lost all respect for the principles of liberty which animated the fathers and which lie at the root of our free institutions. They care for nothing, I am sorry to say, except spoils and power, and they represent nothing else except as the result of false pretenses.

But the people of this nation are not debauched if they are. They have deluded and deceived the people for now this long time, but they can not continue to do so indefinitely. Abraham Lincoln, who would not know one of these leaders as a Republican if he could come back to earth and should meet him in the middle of the street, declared that it was possible to fool some of the people all the time and all of the people some of the time, but that it was not possible to fool all the people all of the time. There will come an awakening some time, be assured of that, and the rapid trend of events convinces me that the day is not far distant. If I did not believe so I should despair of my country. When that day comes and the giant rises from his sleep, he will break the Liliputian bonds with which you have encompassed him like rotten threads and will sweep you away from his temple as the wind sweeps away a devouring plague of locusts. All hail the day! May it come soon, and may it be long before the giant sleeps again.

I desire now to look briefly at the aspect in which we have presented ourselves to the world in this Filipino business under the principles of international law; and I say, in the light of those principles, that we are absolutely destitute of the slightest particle of legal right in the Philippine Archipelago and have been so ever since our contest with the Filipinos began.

Our war there is a war of conquest, pure and simple; the conquest of an allied and friendly people, of a free people, of a republican people, who but for our action would now be enjoying in peace and security institutions as free and liberal as those which we ourselves enjoy.

It has been argued that we acquired title to the Philippine Archipelago by conquest from Spain, but that is absolutely untrue. Our commissioners at Paris while negotiating the peace treaty investigated that question, and they informed the President of the United States in a dispatch, which I shall now read to the Senate, that that contention could not be maintained consistently with the principles of international law. I find that dispatch in Senate Document No. 148, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, page 40:

Mr. Day to Mr. Adee.

[Telegram.]

UNITED STATES PEACE COMMISSION,
Paris, November 3, 1898—10 a. m.

(For the President.—Special.)

After a careful examination of the authorities, the majority of the Commission are clearly of the opinion that our demand for the Philippine Islands can not be based on conquest.

When the protocol was signed Manila was not captured, siege was in progress, and capture made after the execution of the protocol. Captures made after agreement for armistice must be disregarded and status quo restored as far as practicable. We can require cession of Philippine Islands only as indemnity for losses and expenses of the war. Have in view, also, condition of islands, the broken power of Spain, anarchy in which our withdrawal would leave the islands, etc. These are legitimate factors. Have written fully.

Thursday, 11.30 morning.

DAY.

This position taken by our peace commissioners is amply sustained by all the writers on international law. I shall not detain the Senate by an extended examination of the works on that subject, but shall content myself with reading briefly from Halleck, at pages 777 and 778, sections 2, 3, and 23:

SEC. 2. We will here consider the question, When do the rights of military occupation begin, or how are we to fix the date of a conquest? Bouvier defines a conquest to be "the acquisition of the sovereignty of a country by force of arms, exercised by an independent power, which reduces the vanquished to the submission of its empire." It follows, then, that the rights of military occupation extend over the enemy's territory only so far as the inhabitants are vanquished or reduced to submission to the rule of the conqueror.

Thus, if a fort, town, city, harbor, island, province, or particular section of country belonging to one belligerent is forced to submit to the arms of the other, such place or territory instantly becomes a conquest, and is subject to the laws which the conqueror may impose on it; although he has not yet acquired the plenum dominium et utile, he has the temporary right of possession and government. As this temporary title derives its validity entirely from the force of arms on the one side and submission to such force on the other, it necessarily follows that it extends no further and continues no longer than such subjugation and submission extend and continue. Thus, if one belligerent take possession of a port, or town, or province of the other, he can not, therefore, pretend to extend his government and laws over places or provinces which he has not yet reduced to submission, or by reason of a particular possession to claim a general control and authority.

By occupying a port of an enemy's coast we have a right, so long as we retain its possession, to exclude neutral vessels from such port or admit them on such terms as to us may seem fit and proper, but we can not exclude neutral vessels or impose our regulations upon neutral commerce in ports of the enemy which are not in our possession. To extend the rights of military occupation or the limits of conquest by mere intention, implication, or proclamation would be establishing a paper conquest infinitely more objectionable in its character and effects than a paper blockade.

* * * * * * *

Section 3:

It must not be inferred, from what has just been said, that the conqueror can have no control or government of hostile territory unless he actually occupies it with an armed force. It is deemed sufficient that it submits to him and recognizes his authority as a conqueror, for conquests are in this way extended over the territory of an enemy without actual occupation with armed force. But so much of such territory as refuses to submit, or to recognize the authority of the conqueror, and is not forcibly occupied by him, can not be regarded as under his control or within the limits of his conquest.

I read further from this same author, at page 799, section 23:

SEC. 23. But suppose war to be declared and actually commenced, and that one of the belligerents has made manifest his intention to effect the permanent acquisition of a particular portion of the territory of the other, which intention is afterwards accomplished by actual conquest, and that after the declaration of such intention, and while preparation was making to carry it out, the original owner should alienate that territory, in whole or in part, is the conqueror bound to regard such alienation as a valid transfer, or may he disregard it in toto as being an illegal attempt to deprive him of the rights of war?

In other words, did not his avowed determination to effect the permanent acquisition of such territory, his preparation to make the conquest, and his ability to effect it, as proved by the result, give to the conqueror some inchoate or inceptive right to the territory subsequently conquered, or did they not at least suspend the right of the original owner to alienate it? In order to obtain a satisfactory solution of this question, we recur to fundamental principles. The rights of conquest are derived from force alone. They begin with possession and end with the loss of possession. The possession is acquired by force, either from its actual exercise or from the intimidation it produces. There can be no antecedent claim or title from which any right of possession is derived; for if so it would not be a conquest. The assertion and enforcement of a right to possess a particular territory do not constitute a conquest of that territory. By the term conquest we understand the forcible acquisition of territory admitted to belong to the enemy.

Since the peace protocol between the United States and Spain was signed on the 12th day of August, 1898, and the surrender of the city of Manila to us did not take place until the 13th day of August, one day thereafter, it follows necessarily that our possession of that city must be referred to the peace protocol and not to any conquest effected by its capture from the Spanish forces. But for the peace protocol, which provided that it should be given into our possession and retained by us pending the negotiation of the definite treaty of peace, we would have been compelled to return it to Spain, and thereby restore the status quo. But inasmuch as the protocol contemplated our possession, we continued to hold it as a pledge for the good faith of Spain in going forward and carrying out, under the terms of the protocol, the peace for which that protocol provided.

Our sovereignty, then, if we have any sovereignty there at all, did not accrue or commence until the treaty of Paris was ratified by the Senate of the United States, and thereby came to have force and effect; and that event did not occur until the 5th day of February, 1899. Prior to that date no right of ours under international law, except the right to hold the city of Manila as a pledge, which was really holding it under the right of Spain, had accrued in those islands. The effect of this was that the Philippine insurgents were at entire liberty, so far as any intervening rights of ours went, to continue their revolutionary war, to drive Spain from the islands, and to set up and maintain their own independent government. This, as we have seen, they did do.

On the 5th day of February, 1899, Spain did not hold a foot of soil in the entire archipelago. On that day every foot of soil in the islands, outside of those southern islands which professed the Mohammedan religion and which never did acknowledge the sovereignty of Spain any more than they now acknowledge our sovereignty, was in the possession of and giving cheerful allegiance to the Philippine republic. As we have seen, that republic was established on the 21st day of January, 1899, taking the place of the revolutionary government which was established on the 23d day of June, 1898.

Is there anyone in this country or in this body who will say that that people did not have the right to go on and throw off the sovereignty of Spain and to take that sovereignty to themselves, no right of ours or of any other nation having intervened to prevent them from doing so? That proposition, Mr. President, is answered by our own Declaration of Independence:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Who is there that would deny to that people this God-given right of revolution, declared by this sacred instrument, which marks the beginning of our own struggle for liberty and independence? Had they not suffered a train of abuses and usurpations at the hands of Spain, not indeed evincing a design to reduce them to despotism, because that had already been accomplished, but under which their property and their lives and the honor of their wives and daughters were held subject to the caprice of their merciless and lawless and tyrannical oppressors? Who is there, then, in this land of liberty that would have stayed their hands and bid them stop? No one. No one did stay or stop them or attempt to stop them. They went on with the glorious work of liberating their country in the face of our forces in the islands until long before Spain undertook to cede them to us there was not a single solitary living human being in those islands who represented or claimed to represent in that land the hated despotism of Spain.

It needed no recognition from any foreign government to establish their sovereignty and their independence. They became a nation by their own unity and their own valor. If other nations from prudential reasons declined to give them recognition, that fact could not alter their internal status or change that which had become a solemn fact in the economy of the world. Recognition has to do only with the rights and duties of the citizens of the recognizing state. It has nothing whatever to do with the respective rights of the new state and the older established states. A people become a nation when they are such in fact, and from that time they are entitled to internal sovereignty, to equal independence among the nations, and to have their right recognized and respected by all the world.

This proposition is laid down by the writers upon international law with as much force as the other proposition to which I called the attention of the Senate a few moments ago, and to sustain which I read from Halleck. Upon this proposition I beg to read from Mr. Wheaton's work on international law, at pages 31 and 32, sections 20 and 21, and also at page 39, sections 26 and 27. I send the book to the desk and ask that the Secretary may read the parts which I have indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 20. Sovereignty is the supreme power by which any state is governed. This supreme power may be exercised either internally or externally.

Internal sovereignty is that which is inherent in the people of any state, or vested in its ruler, by its municipal constitution or fundamental laws This is the object of what has been called internal public law, droit public interne, but which may more properly be termed constitutional law.

External sovereignty consists in the independence of one political society in respect to all other political societies. It is by the exercise of this branch of sovereignty that the international relations of one political society is maintained, in peace and war, with all other political societies. The law by which it is regulated has, therefore, been called external public law, droit public externe, but may more properly be termed international law.

The recognition of any state by other states and its admission into the general society of nations may depend, or may be made to depend, at the will of those other states, upon its internal constitution or form of government or the choice it may make of its rulers. But whatever be its internal constitution or form of government, or whoever may be its rulers, or even if it be distracted with anarchy, through a violent contest for the government between different parties among the people, the state still subsists in contemplation of law until its sovereignty is completely extinguished by the final dissolution of the social tie or by some other cause which puts an end to the being of the state.

SEC. 21. Sovereignty is acquired by a State either at the origin of the civil society of which it is composed or when it separates itself from the community of which it previously formed a part and on which it was dependent. (a)

This principle applies as well to internal as to external sovereignty. But an important distinction is to be noticed in this respect between these two species of sovereignty. The internal sovereignty of a State does not, in any degree, depend upon its recognition by other States. A new State springing into existence does not require the recognition of other States to confirm its internal sovereignty. The existence of the State de facto is sufficient in this respect to establish its sovereignty de jure. It is a State because it exists.

Thus the internal sovereignty of the United States of America was complete from the time they declared themselves "free, sovereign, and independent States," on the 4th of July, 1776. It was upon this principle that the Supreme Court determined, in 1808, that the several States composing the Union, so far as regards their municipal regulations, became entitled, from the time when they declared themselves independent, to all the rights and powers of sovereign States, and that they did not derive them from concessions made by the British King. The treaty of peace of 1782 contained a recognition of their independence, not a grant of it. From hence it resulted that the laws of the several State governments were, from the date of the Declaration of Independence, the laws of sovereign States, and as such were obligatory upon the people of such State from the time they were enacted. It was added, however, that the court did not mean to intimate the opinion that even the law of any State of the Union, whose constitution of government had been recognized prior to the 4th of July, 1776, and which law had been enacted prior to that period, would not have been equally obligatory. (b)

The external sovereignty of any State, on the other hand, may require recognition by other States in order to render it perfect and complete. So long, indeed, as the new State confines its action to its own citizens, and to the limits of its own territory, it may well dispense with such recognition; but if it desires to enter into that great society of nations, all the members of which recognize rights to which they are mutually entitled and duties which they may be called upon reciprocally to fulfill, such recognition becomes essentially necessary to the complete participation of the new State in all the advantages of this society. Every other State is at liberty to grant or refuse this recognition, subject to the consequences of its own conduct in this respect, and until such recognition becomes universal on the part of the other States the new State becomes entitled to the exercise of its external sovereignty as to those States only by whom that sovereignty has been recognized.

Mr. TURNER. Now I ask the Secretary to turn to page 39, sections 26 and 27.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 26. If the revolution in a State be effected by a province or colony shaking off its sovereignty, so long as the independence of the new State is not acknowledged by other powers it may seem doubtful, in an international point of view, whether its sovereignty can be considered as complete, however it may be regarded by its own government and citizens. It has already been stated that whilst the contest for the sovereignty continues, and the civil war rages, other nations may either remain passive, allowing to both contending parties all the rights which war gives to public enemies, or may acknowledge the independence of the new State, forming with it treaties of amity and commerce, or may join in an alliance with one party against the other.

In the first case neither party has any right to complain so long as other nations maintain an impartial neutrality and abide the event of a contest. The two last cases involve questions which seem to belong rather to the science of politics than of international law; but the practice of nations, if it does not furnish an invariable rule for the solution of these questions, will at least shed some light upon them. The memorable examples of the Swiss Cantons and of the seven united provinces of the Netherlands, which so long levied war, concluded peace, contracted alliances, and performed every other act of sovereignty before their independence was finally acknowledged—that of the first by the German Empire and that of the latter by Spain—go far to show the general sense of mankind on this subject.

The acknowledgment of the independence of the United States of America by France, coupled with the assistance secretly rendered by the French court to the revolted colonies, was considered by Great Britain as an unjustifiable aggression, and, under the circumstances, it probably was so. (a) But had the French court conducted itself with good faith and maintained an impartial neutrality between the two belligerent parties, it may be doubted whether the treaty of commerce, or even the eventual alliance between France and the United States, could have furnished any just ground for a declaration of war against the former by the British Government. The more recent example of the acknowledgment of the independence of the Spanish-American provinces by the United States, Great Britain, and other powers, while the parent country still continued to withhold her assent, also concurs to illustrate the general understanding of nations that where a revolted province or colony has declared and shown its ability to maintain its independence the recognition of its sovereignty by other foreign States is a question of policy and prudence only.

SEC. 27. This question must be determined by the sovereign legislative or executive power of these other states, and not by any subordinate authority or by the private judgment of their individual subject. Until the independence of the new state has been acknowledged, either by the foreign state where its sovereignty is drawn in question, or by the government of the country of which it was before a province, courts of justice and private individuals are bound to consider the ancient state of things as remaining unaltered.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, there is absolutely no escape from the logic of this law as applied to the undisputed facts in the case. For three years now we have been waging a war of conquest against an independent republic, a war destitute of the slightest foundation of right under international law, a war which calls aloud for the reprobation of the God of nature, under whose laws all nations repose for their defense and security, and which will receive His reprobation, rest assured of that, if not by bringing our present purposes to naught, then, sooner or later, some time in our history, by turning our victory to Dead Sea fruit upon our lips.

A nation can not more than individuals avoid the self-wounds inflicted by moral transgressions, and it does not require us to look deeply into the future to see those from which we shall suffer as the result of this transgression. Ten million discontented and rebellious subjects suffering from wrongs which have sunk deeply into their hearts is not a cheerful prospect to begin with. The further fact that they are 7,000 miles distant, will have no disposition to defend themselves, and that we can not defend them in case of war with any first-class power is a still less cheerful prospect for us to contemplate.

But these facts sink into insignificance beside the wound inflicted upon our national organic structure and upon the traditional principles of liberty which we have inherited from our forefathers, which have followed us through all of our growth, and which are a more precious inheritance to our children than all the lands and all the people and all the wealth of all the lands and all the people in the world outside our own land and outside the 80,000,000 liberty-loving American people who inhabit that land.

Oh, my Republican friends, what a tangled skein you have woven for us in the Orient as the result of your policy there! I conjure you to unravel that skein while there is yet time. I conjure you not alone in the name of the hapless Filipinos who trusted you and whose land you have drenched with blood, but I conjure you in the name of 80,000,000 American people and their children and their children's children to stay your hand lest their precious liberties be destroyed along with those of the unhappy people devoted by you to conquest and subjugation and spoliation.

I have heard much, since this Filipino business began, about the obligations of honor which required us to pursue the course we have pursued in the Philippines, much about the great trust that had been devolved upon us there as the result of the war with Spain. I have never, however, heard but one man undertake to analyze those obligations of honor and undertake to defend our course there after such an analysis, and that was the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], in a speech which he delivered in this Chamber two years ago next June, just before the commencement of the Presidential campaign of that year.

His analysis of the reasons for our action was this: First, that we could not honorably conclude peace with Spain and leave out any provision concerning the Philippine Islands, because, he said, that would leave the Filipinos and the Spaniards still at war, and the result would be that the Spanish forces would return to the islands, subdue the Filipinos, and continue to compel them to yield obedience to their tyrannical and arbitrary government. Second, that we could not require the Spaniards to relinquish sovereignty for the benefit of the Filipino people as we had required them to relinquish sovereignty of the island of Cuba for the benefit of the Cubans, because their pride, already too badly strained in the other terms we had imposed upon them, would have revolted, and that the result would have been a renewal of our war with them. Hence, since neither of the two alternative courses indicated was admissible, he insisted that honor required us to take the sovereignty of the islands to ourselves in order that we might, by our Government, through such course as we might in future pursue, secure the Filipino people the blessings of liberty, which they were striving to secure for themselves.

But unfortunately the claim of the inadmissibility of the first and second alternatives of the Senator fails entirely in the light of well-known facts, facts well known at least in this day, and hence his third necessary alternative is left without any foundation for its support. I agree with him that we could not honorably conclude peace and make no mention of the Filipinos, or make no mention of the Philippine Islands. But I do not agree with him that if we had done so the Filipinos could not have maintained themselves against the power of Spain. On the contrary, I say that they could have done so. The testimony of all of our military authorities there in the islands was that Spain never could have subdued the people of those islands and that they could and would have continued their struggle for independence until they had attained it.

I will call the attention of the Senate to what General Merritt said concerning the first alternative of the Senator from Wisconsin in his testimony before our peace commissioners at Paris:

Mr. GRAY. Suppose, by final treaty with Spain, we should abandon Luzon and all the Philippines, exacting such terms and conditions and guaranties as we should think necessary, and abandon them entirely, reserving only a coaling station, perhaps; what do you think they would do about it?

General MERRITT. I think in the island of Luzon they would fight to the bitter end. I have talked with a number of them, intelligent men, who said their lives were nothing to them as compared with the freedom of the country—getting rid of Spanish government.

Mr. DAVIS. Do you think Spain would be able to reduce them?

General MERRITT. No, sir.

I imagine that General Merritt, who commanded the American forces in the Philippine Islands, who received the surrender of the city of Manila, and who had in addition to his own observation the benefit of the reports of all his subordinates concerning the power and the force of the people of those islands, knows more about this proposition than does the Senator from Wisconsin, and he says that Spain never could have reduced those islands and that they would have continued to struggle to the bitter end against the hated sovereignty of that country. Other considerations ought to have prevented us remitting the insurgents to another struggle with Spain, but not the one advanced by the Senator from Wisconsin.

How is it with the second alternative? Is it a fact that the pride of Spain had already been so badly strained by the terms imposed by us that she would have revolted and continued the war rather than to have inserted in the treaty of peace a provision relinquishing the islands for the benefit of their own people? There is not the slightest particle of evidence in anything that transpired during the negotiations between the commissioners of the respective countries which indicates anything of the kind. So far as anything appears to the contrary, Spain would just as readily have submitted to a provision in that treaty relinquishing the sovereignty of those islands as she did in the case of Cuba, just as readily as she did consent to their cession to us. Indeed, it is more than likely that she would have preferred that course if it had been proposed to her.

If she had been unwilling to do so, everybody knows that she was prostrate in the dust before us and that she would have been compelled to accept any terms, not absolutely dishonorable, that we chose to impose. It seems, therefore, that the third alternative of the Senator from Wisconsin, which is the one adopted by us, to wit, that we ourselves accept the cession of the islands, has failed of justification upon any ground stated by that Senator. There is, in truth, no ground upon which it can be justified. The speech of the Senator to which I refer was delivered just before the last Presidential campaign, and was, I imagine, largely for home consumption, because it was distributed by the hundreds of thousands throughout the United States during that campaign.

There is one other proposition in it which bears upon some things I have been discussing here, which I wish to notice for a moment, and that is that the Filipinos, if they were our allies in the war with Spain, were false and treacherous allies. The Senator founded that allegation—and it constituted a very great portion of his speech, because he rung the charge of treachery with great force from beginning to end throughout that speech—upon an anonymous letter found by our military forces in the city of Iloilo after they had taken possession of that city. The writer of that letter addressed the commander of the Spanish forces in Iloilo urging him to make common cause with the Filipinos against the Americans, and indicating in the letter that a similar communication had been made by the writer to the general commanding the Spanish forces in the city of Manila before that city surrendered.

This anonymous letter was signed in this wise, "1-1-9-6-1 M;" and the Senator from Wisconsin attributed the letter to Aguinaldo himself, because he said it was written on the private paper used at the headquarters of Aguinaldo, and because the letter "M," which followed the cabalistic figures, stood for "Miong;" that the letter "M" indicated "Miong;" and he said "Miong" was the cipher name for Emilio in the Filipino cipher. It did not seem to have occurred to the Senator that if Aguinaldo was taking this mysterious manner of communicating with our enemies, and desired to conceal his own connection with the matter, he would hardly have written upon his own paper and thus have enabled the authenticity of the letter to be traced, nor did it seem to occur to the Senator that the fact of the letter being signed "M" was not any very great reason for claiming that "M" stood for "Miong," which, upon some authority that he did not explain, he said was the cipher name of Emilio Aguinaldo.

It would be just as logical a deduction to say that the letter "M" stood for "moon," and, since it is a nursery legend that the moon is made of green cheese, that whenever our infants cry for the moon they are exhibiting an inherited appetite for that article of food. [Laughter.] Yet it was upon that flimsy evidence that the Senator from Wisconsin arraigned the Filipino people as false and treacherous to the United States from the very beginning of their connection with us in the Philippine Islands.

The fact of the matter is that they were our open, honorable allies in the war with Spain, not because they had any particular affection for the American people—for they knew nothing about the American people—but because they expected by assisting us to expel Spain from the islands that they would be enabled thereby to acquire their own independence, and they did act honorably, uprightly, and fairly with us until, after the close of the war, it became apparent that this country proposed to extend its own sovereignty over the islands and to deny their aspirations for independence. Then they very naturally and justly became hostile to us. That is all there is about that matter.

Mr. President, let us go forward and look for a moment at the manner in which we have executed this trust of government which we ravished by force and against law and morals from the Filipino people. The first step in the establishment of civil government in the islands was the abdication by Congress of the function devolved on it by the Constitution, and on it alone, to define and create and establish the governmental institutions of our Territories, and Congress by a solemn enactment made the President of the United States the czar and autocrat of those islands, and invested him with authority, by a mere ukase, to establish such a government there as he pleased and to administer it by such instruments and agencies as he pleased. This was not the execution of a trust, but was an abandonment of it.

The President, finding this power devolved upon him, from the best of motives, I have no doubt, appointed what he called the Philippine Commission for the civil government of those islands, composed of five distinguished Americans, who have been there now for the last two years engaged in that very arduous undertaking. They were given a princely salary for their services; I have heard it stated at $20,000 per annum, and I presume that is true.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Only for the president of the Commission.

Mr. TURNER. And how much for the others?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Fifteen thousand dollars.

Mr. TURNER. Fifteen thousand dollars for the others. We will say, then, $20,000 for the president and $15,000 each for the four others. It was not to be expected, therefore, that they would be niggardly when they came to fix the salaries of their associates and subordinates in the government of those islands. I was not disappointed, therefore, on looking through this bulky document on our tables, consisting of some 800 pages, entitled Laws and Resolutions Passed by the Philippine Commission, to find, as I had hoped to be, that they have fastened a perfect swarm of American officeholders on that desolated country and that those officeholders are now drawing from its exhausted treasury, supported entirely by the onerous taxation of its people, the enormous sum of more than $2,000,000 per annum.

I find this fact stated in the annual report of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, part 2 of the report of the Philippine Commission. According to that report there are in the civil service established by this Philippine Commission 1,172 Americans, drawing yearly salaries aggregating $1,233,774. There are in the municipal service of the city of Manila 616 Americans, drawing a yearly sum of $652,500, and in the judicial service there are 33 such Americans, drawing $106,300, making a total of 1,821 American officials imported there, drawing the sum of $1,992,584 in salaries, to say nothing of their perquisites and expenses, concerning which this report shows nothing. To this sum must be added the salaries given to our Philippine Commissioners themselves, making the amount drawn from the exhausted treasury of that desolated country over $2,000,000.

I said at the time that extraordinary law was before the Senate for passage that it created not only a despotism in that country, but that it would lead to the robbery and spoliation of the people of the country. This appears now not only too true, but to make matters worse it appears from authentic documents before us that these officials sent over there for the government of those islands do not even conduct the government in the interest of the people of the islands. Our commissioners, honorable men as they are said to be, and I have no doubt they are, are yet the mere puppets of the executive department of the Government, and their so-called laws are not those which, on due consideration, they find required by the interest of the people of the islands, but they are such as the commissioners are told to enact by the President of the United States and the Secretary of War.

I find on looking through this compilation of the laws and resolutions of the Commission a number of instances where this Commission, appointed to enact laws for the Filipinos, has not been ashamed to spread upon the record in the very body of the laws the fact that the laws were not enacted upon their own responsibility for the interest of the people of that country, but that they were enacted because the Commission had been told to enact them from this end of the line. For instance, on page 189 I find a law providing for the establishment of the several executive departments of the government of that country, prefaced in this way:

Whereas the President of the United States, upon February 23, signed the following executive order—

An order requiring the establishment of those departments there—

Now, therefore, by authority of the President of the United States, and with the concurrence and approval of the Secretary of War first had, be it enacted by the United States Philippine Commision, that, etc.

On page 273 I find another law, the enacting clause reading thus:

By authority of the President of the United States, and with the consent of the Secretary of War first had, be it enacted by the United States Philippine Commission, that, etc.

On page 587 I find another act:

By authority of the President of the United States, and with the concurrence and approval of the Secretary of War first had, be it enacted by the United States Philippine Commission, that, etc.

And again I find another law prefaced with a whereas that the President of the United States had directed its enactment, this last enactment being found upon page 607 of the public laws and resolutions of the Philippine Commission. I find, moreover, on looking into the history of the tariff law there, which it is the object of this law to fasten upon those people by Federal authority—because this measure that we have now under consideration adopts the tariff law enacted by the Philippine Commission—I find that even that was not enacted by the Commission upon a consideration of what the interests of the people of the Philippine Islands required, but that it was enacted after the law had been submitted to the Secretary of War, after the Secretary of War had called for an expression from every man and every corporation in this country that had anything to sell to the people of those islands, and after the tariff had been made to correspond, not to what the necessities of the people of the Philippine Islands required, but to what the interests of the manufacturers in this country required.

I wish to have the Secretary read from Senate Document No. 134, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, being a memorandum submitted to us by the Secretary of War, showing the manner in which the information was collected upon which the tariff bill passed by the Philippine Commission was framed, how it was framed, and the considerations which were potent with those who framed it.

The Secretary read as follows:

From San Francisco came a request for a lower duty on gasoline in order to give a market for gasoline launches, stoves, and articles of like character. Exporters in New York objected to a specific classification for precious and semiprecious stones, showing that it was impossible to make a specific rate that would bear any just relation to the value of the articles, and urged the imposition of an ad valorem rate for said merchandise. An article in the New York Journal of Commerce pointed out the inequalities in the iron schedule owing to "a dogged adherence to specific rates," pointing out that apparatus and appliances for electric lighting and power pay ten times the rate prescribed for rails.

Objections were offered also to some paragraphs of the chemical schedule, and certain industries asked for a more favorable rate for articles which they manufactured. There were serious objections made both to the cotton schedule and to the provision requiring that samples be washed and dried before being appraised for duty. These objections came both from the East and the West and were given consideration in the revision made by the Department. The rate proposed for printing paper met with objections, and arguments were advanced for a low duty upon the same, as it would be an important factor in the educational development of the islands. The duty on harness and harness-makers' wares was considered high and a material reduction was urged. The specific and elaborate schedule for watch cases and movements prepared by the Commission met with serious protest, and the impracticability of making a just and equitable schedule on a specific basis was demonstrated, as watches, like precious stones, have no basis of specific valuation, aside from the price, that would be possible to apply in the assessment of an adequate duty thereon.

It was also urged that the duty on typewriters be made lower, as they, too, were educational in their influence, and ought to be given a low rate. The rate on meats, salted and in brine, as well as canned goods of all kinds, was the object of considerable correspondence with producers in the middle West and on the Pacific coast. It was urged that the duty on alcohol be made much higher, in order to prevent the importation of the same for the purpose of making a composite liquor out of the pure alcohol, to the detriment of the revenue and to the liquor sold in the archipelago.

All the correspondence received relative to the proposed tariff was briefed from time to time and forwarded to the Commission at Manila for its information. The advice and views of the collector of customs for Cuba was also requested as to a number of subjects about which it was thought that his experience would afford valuable information, and he took pains to aid in all things brought to his attention.

After the period for receiving suggestions and recommendations had elapsed the work of revision was taken up and each class, group, and paragraph was studied, and in the light of the information received some guarded changes were introduced, the most important being the introduction of a number of provisos, whereby when articles nearly equal in weight, but varying greatly in value, came under the same paragraph the specific duty was to a certain extent equalized, or made to more nearly conform to value, by stating that articles classified under such paragraph should not pay a less duty than 15 or 20 per cent, according to the nature of the goods. This it was thought would tend to equalize tariff taxes without overburdening any single article of necessary consumption and at the same time afford a material increase of revenue.

The first revision was made after a study of the tariff as a whole and in view of the suggestions offered by the commercial interests of the country. Not over 10 per cent of the paragraphs in the proposed tariff met with objections, and this may be taken as an indication of the care bestowed upon it, both by the board and the Philippine Commission.

The rates in no case, except in articles of luxury, such as sparkling wines and fine china, are high. Articles of prime necessity have been taxed lightly; those needed in the development of agriculture and for the improvement of roads and transportation have also been made low. Prohibitive rates have been avoided, and the rapid progress and development of the islands have been kept steadily in view, together with the other side of the question, that the insular government must have revenue for current expenses and for needed improvements.

After the first revision of rates by the Department the proposed tariff was sent to the appraiser of the New York custom-house, who submitted its various classes to different expert appraisers for criticism as to the descriptive language employed, for the purpose of evading, as far as possible, all ambiguous and contradictory language. The reports of the various experts were transmitted to the Department, and their suggestions were carefully considered, and, so far as it was thought best, were embodied in the tariff.

After this second revision Mr. W. Morgan Shuster, who had served as special deputy collector at Habana, Cuba, and who had been recommended to the Philippine Commission for collector of customs at Manila, was asked to go over the entire tariff and make such suggestions as his experience in the practical application of a similar tariff would suggest. This resulted in some changes in the rules for the customs treatment of textiles and in the regulations for levying duties upon containers of merchandise, as well as some minor modifications of rates in some few instances.

After all these changes had been made and approved 200 copies of the tariff, now called "Customs tariff for the Philippine Archipelago," were printed, and 100 copies forwarded to the Commission with Mr. Shuster, who was charged with explaining the changes that had been made, with the reasons therefor, and the Commission was instructed to approve or modify by cable, and authorized to enact, promulgate, and enforce the same.

So that we see by this memorandum from the War Department that the Philippine tariff, which we are asked to approve and indorse by the bill now under consideration, was really framed in this country, not alone with a view of meeting the necessities of the people of the Philippine Islands, but largely with a view of meeting the demands of the manufacturing interests of this country, and to-day we have had laid upon our tables here Document No. 171, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, containing 324 pages of correspondence between the War Department and the manufacturers and exporters in this country, showing the demands upon which at that time they insisted and which were largely yielded to in the drafting of the measure. Is it any wonder that the Filipinos are rebellious under such a rule?

The iniquity of this personal and autocratic government has been brought home to us forcibly by the so-called enactment of the Philippine Commission, lately sent to us by the Secretary of War for our information, defining the crimes of treason, insurrection, sedition, conspiracy to commit such crimes, seditious utterances, whether written or spoken, the formation of secret political societies, the administering or taking of oaths to commit crimes or prevent the discovering of the same, and the violation of the oath of allegiance, and prescribing the punishment therefor.

By the first section of that measure it is declared:

That every person resident in the Philippine Islands, owing allegiance to the United States or the government of the Philippine Islands, who levies war against them or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the Philippine Islands or elsewhere, is guilty of treason, and, upon conviction, shall suffer death, or, at the discretion of the court, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than five years and fined not less than $10,000.

Section 2 defines the offense of misprision of treason, and punishes it by imprisonment for seven years and by a fine of not more than $1,000. Then follow the definitions of various other acts, some of which are innocent and some of which are vicious, punishments being affixed therefor; and then I come to sections 9 and 10 of this remarkable enactment.

SEC. 9. All persons who shall meet together for the purpose of forming, or who shall form any secret society, or who shall after the passage of this act continue membership in a society already formed, having for its object in whole or in part the promotion of treason, rebellion, or sedition, or the promulgation of any political opinion or policy, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

SEC. 10. Until it has been officially proclaimed that a state of war or insurrection against the authority or sovereignty of the United States no longer exists in the Philippine Islands, it shall be unlawful for any person to advocate orally or by writing or printing or like methods the independence of the Philippine Islands or their separation from the United States, whether by peaceable or forcible means, or to print, publish, or circulate any handbill, newspaper, or other publication advocating such independence or separation.

Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $2,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year.

This brutal enactment, in its evident intent and purpose to bring to the scaffold every Filipino patriot who shall continue to struggle for the liberty of his country and to seal and lock up in the minds and hearts of the people, by severe penalties, their most sacred aspirations, is without a parallel in the history of modern government. It will be necessary to go back into the dark ages to find its counterpart, if even there it can be found. It is an example and a warning to us that we can not safely repose arbitrary power even in the hands of the best of men, and it is a foretaste of that rule which we ourselves must establish if we shall continue to endeavor to govern men without giving them any voice in their own government.

Since under our theory all of the Filipinos owe allegiance to the United States, it follows, if this enactment is to be enforced in the Philippine Islands, that from this time henceforth every Filipino captured with arms in his hands is to be tried for treason and either sentenced to death or a long term of imprisonment.

Who vested in the Philippine Commission the conscience of this nation in the matter of punishment, if any, to be inflicted upon the Filipino people for their refusal to recognize our authority? Even those who insist most strongly here that our sovereignty in the islands is full and complete will admit, I imagine, that there was room for a difference of opinion on that point between ourselves and the Filipinos, and will look with abhorrence on this attempt to follow the rigors of war with the ignominy of the halter and the scaffold visited on brave men whose only offense has been that they have sought to vindicate, mistakenly, if you will, the liberties of their own country.

But the most remarkable part of this enactment is found in its sections 9 and 10, which undertake to denounce as a crime, punishable with severe penalties, the meeting together in secret for the purpose of advancing or promulgating any political opinion or policy or the advocating openly, orally or in writing or print, the independence of the Philippine Islands or their separation from the United States either by peaceable or forcible means.

It should be remembered in this connection that the only occasion for the Commission to be in those islands at all, the only authority they have to be there, is the act of Congress authorizing the President of the United States to establish civil government there whenever the insurrection shall have been suppressed; and the fact that they are there and undertaking to legislate there presupposes necessarily that the insurrection has been suppressed, at least in those parts of the islands where they are pretending to exercise jurisdiction.

In view of this, what has become of the constitutional guaranties in favor of liberty of speech and of the press, and of the right peaceably to assemble, which all the members of the Supreme Court in the recent insular cases declared accompanied our sovereignty wherever it went, no matter whether that sovereignty was partial, as claimed by some members of the court, or full and complete, as held by the majority of the court? If this atrocious violation of liberty shall be tolerated or passed by without the reprobation of Congress, it will constitute a baleful precedent which will come home to us in America sooner or later and serve as an excuse for the throttling of our own liberties.

I was sorry to see a Senator rise in his place in this body the other day and declare that he approved that measure. I do not approve it. I denounce it not only as unconstitutional, but as a relic of barbarism too black even for the most despotic and tyrannical of governments. The fact that a Senator can be found to tolerate such a breach of liberty is another evidence of the fact, so well known, that familiarity with vice makes the best of men lenient to its hideous defects and imperfections and deformities. It is only too true that the first step in an evil course is but the precursor of others which must necessarily follow. We can not avoid the evil so long as we persist in the evil course. There is but one remedy for an individual or a nation which finds its footsteps turned in such a direction, and that remedy is amendment and reformation.

In the sacred name of liberty, attacked not only in the Philippines but in this country as well and throughout the entire world besides, I demand a cessation of the autocratic and unconstitutional course into which the footsteps of this nation have been turned. We can not mitigate the errors of that course, if we would, but we can, if we will, refuse to continue to pursue that course.

That thought brings me to the substitute for the pending measure, offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS], which I understand represents the sentiments of the minority of the Committee on the Philippine Islands. That substitute is a step, and a long step, in the direction of amendment and reformation in the matter of our dealings with the Philippine Islands. It preserves all the laws and rules and regulations in the islands under which revenues may be raised for the support of government there. It provides for the ultimate independence of the islands under the government of the people of the islands, and provides that we shall continue to maintain order and peace and quiet throughout the islands until, and only until, the people have had an opportunity to establish a government for themselves which can perform that duty.

In all of the speeches which have been delivered on the other side here upon the question of our rights and our duties in the Philippines I do not believe that more than two Senators have distinctly and unequivocally taken a position in favor of continuing to rule and govern the islands without the consent and against the wishes of their own people; possibly not more than one has done so. The one Senator whom I have certainly in mind is my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Mr. Dooley told us that that distinguished Senator was elected to the Senate at the age of 8, thereby reducing the average age of Senators to 93 years; and that it is not to be expected of him that he should take that rigid and ascetic view of conduct, public and private, which older and more mature Senators are supposed to and which they do, in fact, take.

Moreover, we know that at the time he made his pronouncement he had just returned from a visit to those islands, and it was not unnatural that his mind should be filled to the exclusion of common mundane things, with the voluptuous beauties which had been unfolded before his enraptured gaze in that lovely summer land—

> Where the cypress and myrtle
> Are emblems of deeds that are done in their clime;
> Where the rage of the vulture, the love of the turtle,
> Now melt into sorrow, now madden to crime.
> * * * * *
> Where the virgins are soft as the roses they twine,
> And all save the spirit of man is divine.

But I believe all the Senators upon the other side who have pronounced upon this question, unless possibly there be one other, have taken a very different view of the situation from that entertained by the Senator from Indiana. They have said that while they were in favor of continuing to enforce the present rule and sovereignty of our Government in those islands, it was with a view ultimately of giving independence to the people inhabiting them. I have before me some of the expressions of Senators upon that subject.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], in a speech delivered in this Chamber on the 20th day of January, 1899, took this position in a colloquy between himself and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON]:

> Mr. MASON. I understand the Senator to say that he is willing to protect the Filipinos from danger within and foes without, and eventually to give them independence. He claims that we will do the same that we promised to do for Cuba. Do I understand the Senator so to state?
> Mr. NELSON. Certainly; when they are fit for it. Do you know anybody who has a contrary intention in the United States?
> Mr. MASON. Oh, yes. (P. 836, January 20, 1899.)

I suppose Mr. MASON had in mind the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE].

I find that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who has this bill in charge, on the 24th day of January, 1899, also made a speech upon the Philippine question which is exceedingly good reading at this time. From that speech I extract the following:

> I believe that we shall have the wisdom, the self-restraint, and the ability to restore peace and order in those islands and give to their people an opportunity for self-government and for freedom under the protecting shield of the United States until the time shall come when they are able to stand alone, if such a thing be possible, and if they do not themselves desire to remain under our protection. * * * During the campaign of last autumn I said in many speeches to the people of my State that I could never assent to hand those islands back to Spain; that I wanted no subject races and no vassal state, but that we had by the fortunes of war assumed a great responsibility in the Philippines; that we ought to meet it, and that we ought to give to those people an opportunity for freedom, for peace, and for self-government. (P. 959, January 24, 1899.)

On the 11th day of January, 1899, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] also delivered himself upon this subject, and from his speech I extract the following colloquy between himself and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]:

> Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator mean, if the people of the Philippine Islands think it is for their happiness to try to govern themselves, that we should withdraw the power of the United States and let them do it?
> Mr. FORAKER. I think when we come to consider the question of policy with respect to the Philippines, with the conditions there existing, their feeling of friendship, or their feeling of consent or of objection, will have much to do with determining Congress in that respect. I say I do not know of anybody, from the President of the United States down to his humblest follower in this matter, who is proposing by force and violence to take and hold these islands for all time to come. That is all I can say in answer to the Senator. * * *
> It is for the Congress of the United States to investigate and find out about the islands of the Philippines, what kind of inhabitants they may have, whether or not they are capable of government, and whether or not they want government, or whether or not only a few want government. What is the feeling of the population? You can not tell that in the short time we have had to deal with them. At least I have not been able to satisfy my mind about it. I hope, in the near future, to be able to do so, and I hope that in due course, at no distant day, we can act intelligently, and I know we will act justly. (P. 572, January 11, 1899, vol. 32, Part I, third session Fifty-fifth Congress.)

The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has been very full in his several speeches upon this subject. In a speech delivered in the Fifty-fifth Congress, page 1385, volume 32 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I find that he made these very satisfying declarations:

> But, Mr. President, I shrink from the notion that the interests of this country will be subserved by making permanently a part of our land territory thousands of miles away, inhabited by people aliens, not of our blood, not of our way of thinking, foreign to all of our associations, living in a tropical climate, where the white man can not work, under labor conditions of necessity which we would not permit to exist in the United States. (P. 1385, vol. 32, Fifty-fifth Congress.)
> To acquire distant, nonassimilable peoples in order, through permanent domain, to force our trade upon them, seems to me to be the poorest imaginable national policy. (P. 1385, vol. 32, Fifty-fifth Congress.)
> Permanent dominion over the Philippines by the United States as a part of this country means to me an endless and vast burden upon the industries of our people. We would be as sacredly bound to protect that distant people living under our flag in our territory as we would the people living on the coast of Maine or the people living around Boston Harbor. (Same page and volume as above.)
> Our isolation, Mr. President, is one factor which has aided us in devoting our energies to the development of our resources only just begun. (P. 1386, same volume as above.)
> It may not be sentimental or romantic, but it is true we have grown rich by staying at home and attending to our own business. (Same as above.)
> I look with apprehension upon a policy which may place the United States in a position where by force of environment or neighborship we can be made a compulsory participant in the struggles of the Old World nations over the balance of power in the Orient. Nor can I contemplate with equanimity, Mr. President, the adoption of any policy which may bring into perpetual competition with our people—with the men who raise tobacco on our farms, with the men who labor in our factories—the products of a labor which in the very nature of things must be cheaper than ours, because of radical and unchangeable differences, for climatic and other reasons, in the standard of living and in the wage of labor. (Same page and volume as above.)
> I now feel that if the ratification of this treaty involves a permanent dominion by the United States over the archipelago and its people as a territory of the United States, irrevocably committed us to the policy of territorial expansion, I would not give it my vote. (Same page and volume as above.)
> I have talked with a great many people upon the subject in Wisconsin. I have put to them this question: "Do we want the Philippine Archipelago?" Almost every one of them has said to me: "No; but do not give the islands back to Spain." (Same page and volume as above.)

I believe I might cull from the debates in this Chamber extracts from speeches made by quite a number of other Republican Senators in harmony and in unison with these declarations which I have read from the speeches of the Senator from Minnesota, the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from Wisconsin.

It is apparent now, it must be apparent to those Senators, that the people of the Philippine Islands do not want our rule in that country. It must be apparent to them, in view of the full information which we have upon the subject, that the people of the Philippine Islands are fit for and can carry on constitutional government in that archipelago. Why not, then, join with the minority here in putting upon the statute book this wise and just measure proposed as a substitute for the pending measure? It will do what those distinguished Senators have been saying they wanted to do at the proper time. It will bring peace to the islands, and it will result in giving happiness and prosperity under free institutions to the people there, while safeguarding our every interest and securing the execution of all our treaty obligations.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], in concluding the speech which I had occasion to criticise a few moments ago, used the language which I will now read. It is a very eloquent peroration indeed:

> If, Mr. President, in the end it shall come about that through the Spanish-American war we shall have liberated Cuba from the tyranny of Spain, enabled its people to erect an independent government, stable and strong; have made happy and prosperous the people of Porto Rico, and in the far-away Pacific have brought a nonhomogeneous people together into one people, educated them for self-government or independence and given it to them, though it shall have cost much of patience, of trouble, and of sacrifice, we shall have wrought out a consummation more glorious, and afforded a nobler evidence of what liberty-loving people can and will do for liberty than has ever before been seen in the history of the world.

I agree with every word in that peroration. When we shall have done what he says, we will indeed have given a noble evidence to the world of what a liberty-loving people can and will do in behalf of liberty. We have already done much of it. We have given liberty to the people of Cuba and enabled them to establish an independent government of their own, and we have, at least I presume we have, given happiness and prosperity to the people of Porto Rico. Why stop there? Why not complete the happy picture? Why not in the far-away Pacific gather together a nonhomogeneous people—that, I believe, is the term the Senator from Wisconsin used—educate them for liberty and independence, and then give it to them? And if such be our purpose, why not make a declaration of it in some authoritative way?

Yet when there has been a proposition here in the past to make such a declaration, Senators upon the other side have declared with heat and passion that they would never consent to give a pledge to a people with arms in their hands against the power of the United States, and their votes have invariably been given to defeat any such proposition.

It would appear then that if the Filipino people are unable to take us on trust and to see in the flash of every gun that sends a bullet into their breasts, the evidences of a noble and benevolent purpose upon our part, we are to continue to wage against them a desolating and destructive warfare. What a falling off is here from the noble and philanthropic sentiments to which those Senators have given utterance on so many occasions in this Chamber? We will not consent to give a pledge, a mere word, a mere breath, even though it be in accordance with our preconceived determination, even though it will stop bloody warfare, even though it will save a sea of misery and unhappiness, even though it will result in the carrying out of the benevolent and philanthropic purposes which we have held in our hearts and been anxious to extend to those people ever since we have had any connection with them.

Mr. President, I submit to our friends on the other side that they should not permit their angry passions to rise and obscure the noble and benevolent and generous and humane sentiments which have been welling up in their hearts like a living spring, and to which they would have given living and vital expression before this time but for their unfortunate infirmity of temper. You should by all means correct that infirmity. It is a blot upon otherwise noble and perfect characters. Correct it by all means. Give play to your generous and humane sentiments. Join with the minority here in a declaration which is not only in favor of that which they want to accomplish, but in favor of that which you yourselves say that you want to accomplish.

Do this before it is too late, my Republican friends, lest some student of history in the far distant future, who has not had the privilege of knowing you as we know you, looking into your professions and acts, shall conclude in his ignorance what will then appear to be probable—that your professions were a sham and your philanthropy and benevolence a hypocritical cloak under which to hide ignoble and detestable purposes.

For myself, feeling as I do, I could not do anything else than give cheerful support to the substitute offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS]. It is just and right. It will stop the war. It will do justice to a people to whom we owe much. It will do justice to our own people. It will bring our Government back to its constitutional orbit. It will secure a restoration of the respect of the world for our professions in favor of liberty. It will secure a restoration of the respect of our own people for our own constitutional limitations. It will make our possessions invulnerable to attack from abroad, and will make our sacred institution, now so badly threatened, invulnerable to attack from any quarter, either at home or abroad.

I know not how other Senators may look upon this proposition. They have the same liberty of conscience and action that I claim for myself. But I declare that I could not lay my head upon my pillow and sleep this night if I could get my consent to pursue any other course.

ADDENDA.

No. 212.] CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Singapore, April 28, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to report that I sent you on the 27th instant, and confirmed in my dispatch No. 211 of that date, a telegram, which, deciphered, read as follows:

"SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington:

"General Aguinaldo gone my instance Hongkong arrange with Dewey cooperation insurgents Manila.

"PRATT."

The facts are these: On the evening of Saturday, the 23d instant, I was confidentially informed of the arrival here, incognito, of the supreme leader of the Philippine insurgents, Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, by Mr. H. W. Bray, an English gentleman of high standing, who, after fifteen years' residence as a merchant and planter in the Philippines, had been compelled by the disturbed condition of things resulting from Spanish misrule to abandon his property and leave there, and from whom I had previously obtained much valuable information for Commodore Dewey regarding fortifications, coal deposits, etc., at different points in the islands.

Being aware of the great prestige of General Aguinaldo with the insurgents, and that no one, either at home or abroad, could exert over them the same influence and control that he could, I determined at once to see him, and, at my request, a secret interview was accordingly arranged for the following morning, Sunday, the 24th, in which, besides General Aguinaldo, were only present the General's trusted advisers and Mr. Bray, who acted as interpreter.

At this interview, after learning from General Aguinaldo the state of and object sought to be obtained by the present insurrectionary movement, which, though absent from the Philippines, he was still directing, I took it upon myself, whilst explaining that I had no authority to speak for the Government, to point out the danger of continuing independent action at this stage; and, having convinced him of the expediency of cooperating with our fleet, then at Hongkong, and obtained the assurance of his willingness to proceed thither and confer with Commodore Dewey to that end, should the latter so desire, I telegraphed the Commodore the same day as follows, through our consul-general at Hongkong:

"Aguinaldo, insurgent leader, here. Will come Hongkong arrange with Commodore for general cooperation insurgents Manila if desired. Telegraph.

"PRATT."

The Commodore's reply reading thus:

"Tell Aguinaldo come soon as possible.

"DEWEY."

I received it late that night, and at once communicated to General Aguinaldo, whom, with his aid-de-camp and private secretary, all under assumed names, I succeeded in getting off by the British steamer Malacca, which left here on Tuesday, the 26th.

Just previous to his departure I had a second and last interview with General Aguinaldo, the particulars of which I shall give you by next mail.

The general impressed me as a man of intelligence, ability, and courage, and worthy the confidence that had been placed in him.

I think that in arranging for his direct cooperation with the commander of our forces I have prevented possible conflict of action and facilitated the work of occupying and administering the Philippines.

If this course of mine meets with the Government's approval, as I trust it may, I shall be fully satisfied; to Mr. Bray, however, I consider there is due some special recognition for most valuable services rendered.

How that recognition can be best made I leave to you to decide.

I have, etc.,

E. SPENCER PRATT,
United States Consul-General.

No. 213.] CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Singapore, April 30, 1898.

SIR: Referring to my dispatch No. 212, of the 28th instant, I have the honor to report that in the second and last interview I had with Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo on the eve of his departure for Hongkong, I enjoined upon him the necessity, under Commodore Dewey's direction, of exerting absolute control over his forces in the Philippines, as no excesses on their part would be tolerated by the American Government, the President having declared that the present hostilities with Spain were to be carried on in strict accord with modern principles of civilized warfare.

To this General Aguinaldo fully assented, assuring me that he intended and was perfectly able, once on the field, to hold his followers, the insurgents, in check and lead them as our commander should direct.

The general further stated that he hoped the United States would assume protection of the Philippines for at least long enough to allow the inhabitants to establish a government of their own, in the organization of which he would desire American advice and assistance.

These questions I told him I had no authority to discuss.

I have, etc.,

United States Consul-General.

No. 217.] CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Singapore, May 5, 1898.

SIR: I regret to have to report that the circumstances attending the departure from here of Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo to join Commodore Dewey, which I had endeavored so hard to prevent being disclosed, were, in substance, made public in yesterday's edition of the Singapore Free Press, from the inclosed copy of which you will note, by reference to my reports Nos. 212 and 213, of the 28th and 30th ultimo, respectively, that though the facts are in the main correctly given, the dates are not quite accurate, and a certain amount of conjecture has been indulged in as regards my action in the matter and that of the commodore.

Almost immediately after the occurrence the editor of the above journal told me that he had been informed, but declined to say by whom.

I endeavored to get him to promise to keep the whole affair quiet, but, though he would not agree to this, he gave me his word not to mention it until after sufficient time should have elapsed to admit of General Aguinaldo's reaching Hongkong, which he must already have done.

Hence no harm can come of the disclosure, and, though it is annoying, I suppose I should rather congratulate myself that the secret possessed by such a number was kept so long.

I have, etc.,

E. SPENCER PRATT,
United States Consul-General.

THE WAR—IMPORTANT POLITICAL ARRANGEMENT—AGUINALDO IN SINGAPORE—AN INCOGNITO VISIT—HE JOINS ADMIRAL DEWEY—PLAN CARRIED OUT BY AMERICAN CONSUL-GENERAL.

Just before the actual outbreak of hostilities between Spain and the United States Singapore has been the scene of a secret political arrangement by which Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo y Fami, the supreme head of the revolutionary movement in the Philippines, has entered into direct relations with Admiral Dewey, commander of the American squadron in China waters, while that officer was still at Hongkong.

In order to understand and appreciate this interesting historical incident properly, it will be necessary to allude to the causes leading to the second appearance of the rebellion in the Philippines, which was almost coincident with, though not instigated by, the strained relations between Spain and the United States.

In December last Gen. Primo de Rivera, who, above all other Spanish generals, has an intimate knowledge of the country and its inhabitants, found the position untenable for both parties. Neither of these had the remotest chance of terminating the rebellion decisively; the rebels secure in their mountain fastnesses, the Spaniards holding the chief towns and villages on the coast. Primo de Rivera therefore sent two well-known Philippine natives, occupying high positions in Manila, to propose terms of peace to General Aguinaldo in Biac-na-Bato. A council of the revolutionary government was held, in which it was agreed to lay down arms on condition of certain reforms being introduced. The principal of these were:

1. The expulsion, or at least secularization, of the religious orders, and the inhibition of these orders from all official vetoes in civil administration.
2. A general amnesty for all rebels, and guarantees for their personal security and from the vengeance of the friars and parish priests after returning to their homes.
3. Radical reforms to curtail the glaring abuses in public administration.
4. Freedom of the press to denounce official corruption and blackmailing.
5. Representation in the Spanish Parliament.
6. Abolition of the iniquitous system of secret deportation of political suspects, etc.

Primo de Rivera agreed to these reforms in sum and substance, but made it a condition that the principal rebel leaders must leave the country during His Majesty's pleasure. As these had lost all their property or had had it confiscated and plundered, the Government agreed to provide them with funds to live in a becoming manner on foreign soil.

The rebels laid down their arms and peace was apparently secured, but no sooner had they done so and returned to their houses than the intransigeant religious orders commenced at once to again persecute them and trump up imaginary charges to procure their rearrest. The Spanish Government, on its side, imagining itself secure, desisted from carrying out the promised reforms, thinking another trick like that played on the Cubans after the peace of Zanjon, arranged by Martinez Campos, might succeed. The Filipinos, however, with this business before them, refused to be made dupes of, and have taken up arms again, not alone in the immediate districts around Manila but throughout the archipelago, which merely awaits the signal from General Aguinaldo to rise en masse, no doubt carrying with them the native troops hitherto loyal, and for which loyal service they have received no thanks but only ingratitude.

Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, accompanied by his aide-de-camp, Col. Marcelo H. del Pilar, and his private secretary, Mr. J. Leyba, arrived incognito in Singapore from Saigon on April 21, 1898. In Saigon, where Aguinaldo had remained for one week, he had interviews with one or two old Filipino friends now resident there. The special purpose of Aguinaldo's visit to Singapore was to consult other friends here, particularly Mr. Howard W. Bray, an old an intimate English friend, for fifteen years resident in the Philippines, about the state of affairs in the islands generally, particularly as to the possibility of war between the United States and Spain, and whether, in such an event, the United States would eventually recognize the independence of the Philippines, provided he lent his cooperation to the Americans in the conquest of the country. The situation of the moment was this, that the conditions of the honorable peace concluded on December 14, 1897, between President Aguinaldo, on behalf of the Philippine rebels, and H. E. Governor-General Primo de Rivera, on behalf of Spain, had not been carried out, although their immediate execution had been vouched for in that agreement.

These reforms would have provided protection to the people against the organized oppression and rapacity of the religious fraternities, would have secured improved civil and criminal procedure in courts, and have guaranteed in many ways improvements in the fiscal and social conditions of the people. The repudiation by the Spanish Government of these conditions, made by Gen. Primo di Rivera, now left the rebel leaders, who had for the most part gone to Hongkong, free to act. And it was in pursuance of that freedom of action that Aguinaldo again sought counsel of his friends in Saigon and Singapore, with a view to the immediate resumption of operations in the Philippines.

Meantime Mr. Bray, whose assistance to this journal on matters connected with the Philippines has been very considerable, as our readers will have seen, was introduced by the editor of the Singapore Free Press to Mr. Spencer Pratt, consul-general of the United States, who was anxious, in view of contingencies, to learn as much as possible about the real condition of the Philippines. It was a few days after this that Aguinaldo arrived incognito in Singapore, when he at once met his friends, including Mr. Bray.

Affairs now becoming more warlike, Mr. Bray, after conversation with Mr. Spencer Pratt, eventually arranged an interview between that gentleman and General Aguinaldo, which took place late on the evening of Sunday, the 24th April, at The Mansion, River Valley road. There were present on that occasion Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo y Fami, Mr. E. Spencer Pratt, consul-general, United States of America; Mr. Howard W. Bray; Aguinaldo's private secretary, Mr. J. Leyba; Col. M. H. del Pilar, and Dr. Marcelino Santos.

During this conference, at which Mr. Bray acted as interpreter, General Aguinaldo explained to the American consul-general, Mr. Pratt, the incidents and objects of the late rebellion, and described the present disturbed state of the country. General Aguinaldo then proceeded to detail the nature of the cooperation he could give, in which he, in the event of the American forces from the squadron landing and taking possession of Manila, would guarantee to maintain order and discipline amongst the native troops and inhabitants in the same humane way in which he had hitherto conducted the war, and prevent them from committing outrages on defenseless Spaniards beyond the inevitable in fair and honorable warfare. He further declared his ability to establish a proper and responsible government on liberal principles, and would be willing to accept the same terms for the country as the United States intend giving to Cuba.

The consul-general of the United States, coinciding with the general views expressed during the discussion, placed himself at once in telegraphic communication with Admiral Dewey at Hongkong, between whom and Mr. Pratt a frequent interchange of telegrams consequently took place.

As a result another private interview was arranged at the American consular residence at the Raffles Hotel between General Aguinaldo, Mr. Spencer Pratt, Mr. Howard Bray, and Mr. Leyba, private secretary to General Aguinaldo.

As a sequel to this interview, and in response to the urgent request of Admiral Dewey, General Aguinaldo left Singapore for Hongkong by the first available steamer, the Peninsular and Oriental Malacca, on Tuesday, the 26th April, at noon, accompanied by his aide-de-camp, Captain del Pilar, and Mr. Leyba, his private secretary.

The only interview or conversation with any strangers that General Aguinaldo had during his stay in Singapore other than the above interviews was during a visit paid by General Aguinaldo to Mr. W. G. St. Clair, editor of the Singapore Free Press, at the office of this journal. On that occasion General Aguinaldo was accompanied by Mr. Bray and Mr. Leyba.

Throughout the whole stay of General Aguinaldo in Singapore the editor was kept fully informed daily of the progress of affairs. Naturally, however, all statement of what occurred has been withheld by us until what has been deemed the fitting moment has arrived.

The substance of the whole incident, in its relations to the recent course of affairs in the Philippines, has been very fully telegraphed by the editor both to New York and London.

The influence of the incident on the future of the Philippines may prove to be of a far-reaching historical character.

AGUINALDO'S POLICY.

General Aguinaldo's policy embraces the independence of the Philippines, whose internal affairs would be controlled under European and American advisers. American protection would be desirable temporarily, on the same lines as that which might be instituted hereafter in Cuba. The ports of the Philippines would be free to the trade of the world, safeguards being enacted against an influx of Chinese aliens who would compete with the industrial population of the country. There would be a complete reform of the present corrupt judicature of the country under experienced European law officers. Entire freedom of the press would be established, as well as the right of public meeting. There would be general religious toleration, and steps would be taken for the abolition and expulsion of the tyrannical religious fraternities who have laid such strong hands on every branch of civil administration. Full provision would be given for the exploitation of the natural resources and wealth of the country by roads and railways, and by the removal of hindrances to enterprise and investment of capital. Spanish officials would be removed to a place of safety until opportunity offered to return them to Spain. The preservation of public safety and order, and the checking of reprisals against Spaniards would, naturally, have to be a first care of the government in the new state of things.

Mr. Pratt to Mr. Day.

No. 223.] CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Singapore, May 20, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to submit for your consideration a proclamation in Spanish, issued prior to the departure of our fleet for Manila by the insurgent leaders in Hongkong, calling upon the Filipinos not to obey the appeal of the Spaniards to oppose the Americans, but to rally in support of these, as they came as their friends and liberators.

Three copies of the English translation of the above I also inclose for hand ing to the press, should that, in your opinion, seem advisable.

AMERICA'S ALLIES—THE MANIFESTO OF THE FILIPINOS.

The following is a translation from the Spanish of a proclamation of the rebel leaders in Hongkong, sent over to the Philippines in advance of the American squadron:

Compatriots: Divine Providence is about to place independence within our reach, and in a way the most free and independent nation could hardly wish for.

The Americans, not from mercenary motives, but for the sake of humanity and the lamentations of so many persecuted people, have considered it opportune to extend their protecting mantle to our beloved country, now that they have been obliged to sever relations with Spain owing to the tyranny this nation is exercising in Cuba, causing enormous injury to the Americans, who have such large commercial and other interests there.

At the present moment an American squadron is preparing to sail for the Philippines.

We, your brothers, are very much afraid that you may be induced to fire on the Americans. No, brothers, never make this mistake. Rather blow your own brains out than fire a shot or treat as enemies those who are your liberators.

Your natural enemies, your executioners, the authors of your misery and unhappiness, are the Spaniards who govern you. Against these you must raise your weapons and odium; understand well, against the Spaniards and never against the Americans.

Take no notice of the decree of the governor-general calling you to arms, although it may cost you your lives. Rather die than be ungrateful to our American liberators.

The governor-general calls you to arms. What for? To defend your Spanish tyrants? To defend those that have despised you, and even in public speeches asked for your extermination—those that have treated you little better than savages? No! No! A thousand times no!

Give a glance at history and you will see that all Spain's wars in Oceania have sacrificed Philippine blood. We have been put to fight in Cochin-China to assist the French in an affair that in no way concerned the Philippines. We were compelled to spill our blood by Simon de Anda against the English, who in any case would have made better rulers than the Spaniards. Every year our children are taken away to be sacrificed in Mindanao and Sulu, on the pretense of making us believe these people are our enemies, when in reality they are our brothers, like us fighting for their independence.

After having sacrificed our blood against the English, against the Annamites, against the people of Mindanao, etc., what recompense or thanks have we received from the Spanish Government? Obscurity, poverty, the butchery of those dear to us. Enough, brothers, of this Spanish tutelage.

Take note, the Americans will attack by sea and prevent any reinforcements coming from Spain; therefore we insurgents must attack by land. Probably you will have more than sufficient arms, because the Americans have arms and will find means to assist us.

There, where you see the American flag flying, assemble in numbers; they are our redeemers.

Our unworthy names are as nothing, but one and all of us invoke the name of the greatest patriot our country has seen, in the sure and certain hope that his spirit will be with us in these moments and guide us to victory—our immortal José Rizal.

Singapore, June 2, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to submit inclosed a telegram from Hongkong of the 25th ultimo on the situation in the Philippines, published in Singapore yesterday afternoon, the 1st instant.

Considering the enthusiastic manner General Aguinaldo has been received by the natives and the confidence with which he already appears to have inspired Admiral Dewey, it will be admitted, I think, that I did not overrate his importance and that I have materially assisted the cause of the United States in the Philippines in securing his cooperation.

Why this cooperation should not have been secured to us during the months General Aguinaldo remained awaiting events in Hongkong, and that he was allowed to leave there without having been approached in the interest of our Government, I can not understand.

No close observer of what had transpired in the Philippines during the past four years could have failed to recognize that General Aguinaldo enjoyed above all others the confidence of the Filipino insurgents and the respect alike of Spaniards and foreigners in the islands, all of whom vouched for his high sense of justice and honor.

SIR: I have the honor to submit an article from the London Spectator, which was reproduced in the Singapore Free Press of yesterday, and a reply thereto, published to-day in the same paper, which last, I think, is deserving of special consideration as being the expression of opinion of Mr. H. W. Bray, one of the best authorities on the Philippines and the Filipinos.

THE FATE OF THE PHILIPPINES.

The author of the Spectator article quoted in your yesterday's issue under the above heading has put forward one sensible proposition. His theories on other points may be all right, but I am afraid he has reckoned without his host. America has not yet conquered the Philippines—not by a long way—but will occupy them with the assistance and good will of the Filipinos. The possession of Manila no more means the possession of the Philippines than the possession of New York means the possession of America, and without this good will and assistance of the inhabitants I must beg leave to state that neither the United States nor any other nation could ever hope to take the Philippines, except with an army of 200,000 men or more, if even then, no matter what theorists may say to the contrary. The solutions which the European papers have been kind enough to put forward re the disposal of the Philippines may be dismissed with the words of General Augustin's proclamation, "Vain designs, ridiculous boasts!" When the time comes I am inclined to think the inhabitants themselves are going to have the biggest say in this question, especially after the events of May 30 to June 1 last.

Spain, with an army of 35,000 men fully armed, has been able to do nothing against an army of imperfectly organized Filipinos, who have never disposed to more than 600 rifles. Yet nobody can taunt the Spanish soldier with want of valor, whilst his patient endurance of hardships and privations, indifferent food, and entire absence of personal comforts give him the advantage over other European soldiers, who require an efficient commissariat and transport department. In a country like the Philippines a soldier to be effective must be able to skip from crag to crag like a goat, without hindrance or paraphernalia, to be evenly matched with the inhabitants.

The Tagals will feel very much insulted if they try to garrison their villages by troops of the type proposed by the writer of the article under review. It would be a dangerous experiment. I would not advise the Americans or anyone else to try. Such crass ignorance on the state of the Philippines and its inhabitants exists on every side that it is almost useless to try and explain to outsiders that the Philippines are as different from British India, Ceylon, Burma, the West Indies, etc., as light is from darkness. The people are the most enlightened and vigorous branch of the Malay race, and have been Christians for centuries, in fact longer than the principles of the Reformation were established in Great Britain, and are the nearest akin to Europeans of any alien race, and it is simply ridiculous to imagine that eight to ten millions of such people can be bought and sold as an article of commerce without first obtaining their consent. Let all those who are greedy for a slice of the archipelago ponder well over this before burning their fingers.

To put them on a level with Sikhs and Afridis is simple nonsense. The much overestimated Sikh would find his match pretty soon with the sturdy Philippine native, and those who think differently had better read what no less an authority than General Gordon says of his Philippine troops in the Taiping rebellion.

No decent or respectable Filipino will tolerate any social relations with the pagan Chinese.

The only possible solution of the Philippine question is an independent government, under American protection, and this is the policy I recommended General Aguinaldo and his compatriots to accept, and which will, no doubt, be carried out. Time will show.

H. W. BRAY.

SIR: I have the honor to report that this afternoon, on the occasion of the receipt of the news of General Aguinaldo's recent successes near Manila, I was waited upon by the Philippine residents in Singapore and presented an address which, though written in Spanish, was delivered in French, and which I accordingly replied to in that language.

The reports of the proceedings sent me by the editors of the Singapore Free Press and Straits Times, both of whom were present, I submit herewith, with duplicates for the press, should you consider their publication desirable.

The original address in Spanish was not left with me, but I am promised it as soon as properly written out, and will then forward it.

My reply, however, I can not forward, as it was not written, but extemporaneous, and has been correctly rendered from the French into English in the within reports, from which you will note that I avoided touching upon the question of our future policy re the Philippines.

I have the honor, etc.,

[Inclosures.—The Straits Times, June 9.]

MR. SPENCER PRATT SERENADED—MEETING OF FILIPINO REFUGEES AT THE UNITED STATES CONSULATE—THEY PRESENT AN ADDRESS TO MR. SPENCER PRATT AND DRINK TO AMERICA, ENGLAND, AND ADMIRAL DEWEY.

The United States consulate at Singapore was yesterday afternoon in an unusual state of bustle. That bustle extended itself to Raffle's Hotel, of which the consulate forms an outlying part. From a period shortly prior to 5 o'clock, afternoon, the natives of the Philippines resident in Singapore began to assemble at the consulate. Their object was partly to present an address to Hon. Spencer Pratt, United States consul-general, and partly to serenade him, for which purpose some 25 or 30 of the Filipinos came equipped with musical instruments. Gradually the crowd gathered in the vicinity of the United States consulate, and after a little quiet preliminary music Dr. Santos, as representing the Philippine community in Singapore, proceeded to read the following address, which was originally drafted in Spanish and then translated into French. The address was read in French, and the following is an English translation:

THE ADDRESS.

"To the Hon. Edward Spencer Pratt, consul-general of the United States of North America, Singapore.

"SIR: The Philippine colony resident in this port, composed of representatives of all social classes, have come to present their respects to you as the legitimate representative of the great and powerful American Republic, in order to express our eternal gratitude for the moral and material protection extended by Admiral Dewey to our trusted leader Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, who has been driven to take up arms in the name of 8,000,000 Filipinos, in defense of those very principles of justice and liberty of which your country is the foremost champion.

"Our countrymen at home, and those of us residing here, refugees from Spanish misrule and tyranny in our beloved native land, hope that the United States, your nation, persevering in its humane policy will efficaciously second the programme arranged between you, sir, and General Aguinaldo in this port of Singapore, and secure to us our independence under the protection of the United States. Our warmest thanks are especially due to you, sir, personally, for having been the first to cultivate relations with General Aguinaldo, and arrange for the cooperation with Admiral Dewey, thus supporting our aspirations which time and subsequent actions have developed and caused to meet with the applause and approbation of your nation. Finally, we request you to convey to your illustrious President and the American people, and to Admiral Dewey, our sentiments of sincere gratitude and our most fervent wishes for their prosperity."

"SINGAPORE, June 8, 1898."

Dr. Santos, having presented the above address to Mr. Spencer Pratt, proceeded, speaking in French, to state his belief that the Filipinos would prove and were now proving themselves fit for self-government. While it would be very desirable that such a government should be under American protection, yet it would be found that the brave Filipinos, who were now driving the Spanish troops before them, were quite fit also to fill offices of civil administration. Referring to certain news which had been telegraphed from Europe, Dr. Santos deprecated the transfer of the Philippines from Spain to any power. He was quite confident that the sympathy of the American people would be with a nation who were struggling to be free.

THE UNITED STATES CONSUL-GENERAL REPLIES.

After listening to the address the United States consul-general, also speaking in French, said:

"Gentlemen, the honor you have conferred upon me is so unexpected that I can not find appropriate words with which to thank you and with which to reply to the eloquent address you have just read to me. Rest assured, though, that I fully understand and sincerely appreciate the motives that have prompted your present action and that your words, which have sunk deep in my heart, shall be faithfully repeated to the President, to Admiral Dewey, and to the American people—from whom I am sure they will meet with full and generous response. A little over a month ago the world resounded with the praises of Admiral Dewey and his fellow-officers and men for a glorious victory won by the American Asiatic Squadron in the Bay of Manila.

"Now we have news of the brilliant achievements of your own distinguished leader, Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, cooperating on land with the Americans at sea. You have just reason to be proud of what has been and is being accomplished by General Aguinaldo and your fellow-countrymen under his command. When, six weeks ago, I learned that General Aguinaldo had arrived incognito in Singapore I immediately sought him out. An hour's interview convinced me that he was the man for the occasion; and having communicated with Admiral Dewey, I accordingly arranged for him to join the latter, which he did, at Cavite. The rest you know.

"I am thankful to have been the means, though merely the accidental means, of bringing about the arrangement between General Aguinaldo and Admiral Dewey which has resulted so happily. I can only hope that the eventful outcome will be all that can be desired for the happiness and welfare of the Filipinos. My parting words to General Aguinaldo were, 'General, when you have proved yourself great, prove yourself magnanimous,' and from the treatment accorded to the recent Spanish prisoners it would appear that he had done so." [Applause.]

At the conclusion of Mr. Pratt's speech refreshments were served, and as the Filipinos, being Christians, drink alcohol, there was no difficulty in arranging as to refreshments. "Long life and prosperity" were drunk to Mr. Consul-General Spencer Pratt. Then the American Republic was cheered. Then Commodore Dewey was cheered for his gallant victory. Then England was cheered for sheltering the Filipino refugees.

PRESENTING A FLAG.

Then Dr. Santos, as the spokesman of the Filipino refugees, again addressed the audience with many complimentary remarks on the gallantry of Admiral Dewey and the skill and foresight of United States Consul-General Pratt and with glowing forecasts of the prosperity that awaited the Philippine Islands under the new régime. He expressed a desire to have an American flag as a reminiscence of the day's proceedings. Mr. Spencer Pratt, again speaking in French, replied, saying:

"This flag was borne in battle, and is the emblem of that very liberty that you are seeking to attain. Its red stripes represent the blood that was shed for the cause; the white represents the purity of the motive; the blue field stands for the azure of the sky; the stars are the free and independent States of the Union. Take the flag and keep it as a souvenir of this occasion."

At the conclusion of Mr. Pratt's speech, he handed an American flag to Dr. Santos, who received it reverently, and waved it exultantly amidst the cheers of the assembled Filipinos. The flag would, said Dr. Santos, be preserved, so that future generations might look at it with pride.

PROCLAMATIONS AND DECREES ESTABLISHING AND EXTENDING REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT.

[Translation.]

Filipinos:

The great North American nation, the cradle of genuine liberty and therefore the friend of our people oppressed and enslaved by the tyranny and despotism of its rulers, has come to us manifesting a protection as decisive as it is undoubtedly disinterested toward our inhabitants, considering us as sufficiently civilized and capable of governing for ourselves our unfortunate country. In order to maintain this high estimate granted us by the generous North American nation we should abominate all those deeds which tend to lower this opinion, which are pillage, theft, and all sorts of crimes relating to persons or property, with the purpose of avoiding international conflicts during the period of our campaign.

I decree as follows:

ARTICLE I. The lives and property of all foreigners, Chinese being included in this denomination, shall be respected, as well as that of all Spaniards who neither directly or indirectly contributed to carry on war against us.

ARTICLE II. Enemies who lay down their arms must also be respected in like manner.

ARTICLE III. All hospitals and ambulances must likewise be respected, as well as all persons and goods found therein, including the staff on duty, unless they manifest hostility.

ARTICLE IV. Those who disobey what is prescribed in these preceding articles shall be tried by summary process and put to death if the said disobedience has resulted in murder, robbery, or rape.

Given in Cavite, the 24th of May, 1898.

My Beloved Fellow-Countrymen:

I accepted the treaty proposed by Don Pedro H. Paterno, agreeing with the captain-general of these islands under certain conditions, and laying down arms and dismissing the forces under my immediate control, because I believed it better for the country than to carry on the insurrection for which resources were lacking, but since the failure to fulfill any of the said conditions certain bands were dissatisfied and remained under arms, and since a period of five months has elapsed without any step toward the reforms which we demand to advance our country to the rank of a civilized nation, like our neighbor, Japan, which in little more than twenty years has advanced to a satisfactory position, and demonstrated her power and vigor in the late war with China, while the Spanish Government remains powerless to contend with certain obstacles which constantly arrest the progress of our country with a deadly influence which has been a principal factor in causing the uprising of the people.

Now that the great and powerful North American nation have come to offer disinterested protection for the effort to secure the liberation of this country, I return to assume command of all the forces for the attainment of our lofty aspirations, establishing a dictatorial government which will set forth decrees under my sole responsibility, assisted by the advice of eminent persons until these islands are completely conquered and able to form a constitutional convention, and to elect a president and a cabinet in whose favor I will duly resign the authority.

Given in Cavite the 24th of May, 1898.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

Filipinos:

This dictatorial government proposes to begin within a few days our military operations, and being informed that the Spaniard intends to send us a parliamentary commission in order to open negotiations for restoring Spanish authority, and being resolved to admit no negotiations of that sort in view of the collapse of a former treaty by default of the same Spanish Government, and noting, moreover, the presence in this place of certain persons coming in the capacity of spies for the said Spanish Government, as general in chief of this region I decree as follows:

ARTICLE I. Civilians or soldiers who enter this territory with authority to negotiate, but without presenting themselves under a flag of truce, as provided for such cases by international law, and also those lacking credentials and documents for their due recognition of character and personality, shall be considered guilty of serving as spies and put to death.

ART. II. Any Filipino who undertakes the aforesaid service shall be considered as a traitor to his country, and there shall be imposed upon him the penalty of hanging by the neck in a public place for the period of two hours with a label attached bearing the statement that he is a traitor to his country.

ART. III. Any soldier or civilian found within our territories seeking to pass over to the enemy bearing secrets of war or plans of fortifications shall also be reckoned as a traitor and put to death.

Given in Cavite the 24th of May, 1898.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

BACOOR, July 15, 1898.

His Excellency the Admiral of the Squadron of the United States in the Islands.

SIR: The revolution having taken possession of the various provinces of the archipelago, this government has found it necessary to adopt the form and organization best suited to the popular will. I have, therefore, the pleasure and honor of placing in your hand the inclosed decrees, which contain the organization referred to, begging that you will communicate to your Government that the desires of this government are to remain always in friendship with the great North American nation, to which we are under many obligations.

I beg, also, that your excellency will have the kindness to forward the inclosed package to H. B. M. consul, with a request from me that he will forward them to their respective destinations.

For which favor the Filipino people and your humble servant will be most deeply grateful to your excellency.

Very respectfully, etc.,

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

[Indorsement to the above—First indorsement.]

U. S. FLAGSHIP OLYMPIA, Cavite, July 17, 1898.

Commanding U. S. Naval Force on Asiatic Station.

DECREES.

[Translation.]

To the People of the Philippines:

Acts of Providence have placed me in a position for which I can not but recognize my natural inefficiency, but as I have no right to violate the laws of Providence, nor to decline the duties which honor and patriotism impose upon me, I greet you, my beloved people, from that position.

In the face of the whole world I have proclaimed that the aspiration of my whole life, the final object of all my wishes and efforts, is your independence, because I have the inner conviction that it is also your constant longing, since independence for us means the redemption from slavery and tyranny, the recovery of lost liberty, and the admission to the concert of civilized nations.

I understand, moreover, that the first duty of any government is to interpret faithfully the aspirations of the people. With this in view, although the abnormal circumstances of the war have compelled me to constitute this dictatorial government, which assumes full civil and military power, my constant desire is to surround myself with the most prominent people from each province who by their conduct deserve its confidence, so that, learning from them the true needs of each, I may be enabled to adopt the most efficacious means for filling such needs and curing deficiencies in accordance with the wishes of all.

I understand, moreover, the urgent necessity of establishing in each town a solid and substantial organization, a stronger bulwark of public security and the only means for insuring the union and discipline which are indispensable for the establishment of a republic—that is, the government of the people by the people—and for settling international conflicts which may arise.

In virtue of the above considerations I decree as follows:

Done at Cavite, June 18, 1898.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

Then follow instructions concerning the government of provinces and towns, dated June 20, 1898, signed by Emilio Aguinaldo, giving special regulations for—

1. The holding of sessions of the different juntas and councils.
2. The organization of police forces, and the character and duties of the same.
3. The organization of tribunals, civil records, and the census.
4. Taxes and registration of property.

AGUINALDO'S PROCLAMATION OF JUNE 18, 1898, ESTABLISHING THE DICTATORIAL GOVERNMENT.

No. 1.

To the Philippine Public:

Circumstances have providentially placed me in a position for which I can not fail to recognize that I am not properly qualified; but since I can not violate the laws of Providence nor decline the obligations which honor and patriotism impose upon me, I now salute you, Oh my Beloved People.

I have proclaimed in the face of the whole world that the aspiration of my whole life, the final object of all my efforts and strength, is nothing else but your independence, for I am firmly convinced that that constitutes your constant desire, and that independence signifies for us redemption from slavery and tyranny, regaining our liberty, and entrance into the concert of civilized nations.

I understand, on the other hand, that the first duty of every government is to interpret faithfully popular aspirations; with this motive, although the abnormal circumstances of the war have compelled me to institute this dictatorial government which assumes full powers, both civil and military, my constant desire is to surround myself with the most distinguished persons of each province, those that by their conduct deserve the confidence of their province, to the end that, the true necessities of each being known by them, measures may be adopted to meet those necessities and apply the remedies in accordance with the desires of all.

I understand, moreover, the urgent necessity of establishing in each town a solid and robust organization, the strongest bulwark of public security and the sole means of securing that union and discipline which are indispensable for the establishment of the republic—that is, government of the people for the people, and warding off the international conflicts which may arise.

Following out the foregoing considerations, I decree as follows:

Given at Cavite the 18th day of June, 1898.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

No. 2.

For the execution and proper carrying out of what is prescribed in the decree of this government concerning the management of the provinces and towns of the Philippine Archipelago, I decree as follows:

INSTRUCTIONS CONCERNING THE MANAGEMENT OF THE PROVINCES AND TOWNS.

(Then follow 45 rules concerning the elections, formation of the police, the courts, and the laying and collection of taxes.)

Given at Cavite the 20th of June, 1898.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE PHILIPPINE REVOLUTION

If it is true—and it is true—that a political revolution, well conceived, is the violent means which a people employs in order to recover the sovereignty which naturally belongs to it and which has been usurped and trampled upon by a tyrannical and arbitrary government, then the Philippine revolution could not have been more just, for the people have had recourse to it after exhausting all peaceful means counseled by reason and experience.

The former kings of Castile bound themselves to regard the Philippines as a sister nation, associated with Spain in perfect unison of views and interests, and by the constitution of 1812, promulgated at Cadiz on the occasion of the war of Spanish independence, these islands were represented in the Spanish Cortes; but the interests of the monastic corporations, which have always met with unconditional support from the Spanish Government, have taken from them this sacred duty, and the Philippines have been excluded from the Spanish constitution and the people left to the mercy of the discretionary and arbitrary powers of the general government.

Under such circumstances the people clamored for justice, and asked of the mother country the recognition and restitution of their secular rights by means of reforms which would gradually assimilate them with Spain. But their voices were promptly drowned, and the reward of their abnegation was exile, martyrdom, and death. The religious corporations, with whose interests—always opposed to those of the Philippine people—the Spanish Government has identified itself, jeered at these claims and answered, with the knowledge and consent of that same Government, that the liberty of Spain had cost blood.

What other recourse was there left to the people to recover their lost rights? They had no other means but force, and, convinced of this, they have had recourse to the revolution.

And now they no longer limit their claims to the assimilation with the political constitution of Spain, but ask for definite separation from her; they are fighting for their independence, firmly convinced that the time has come when they can and must govern themselves.

So they have constituted a revolutionary government, based upon wise and just laws, adapted to the abnormal conditions through which they are passing, and at the same time preparing them to become a true republic. Taking reason as the only guide for their actions, justice as the only end, and honorable work as the only means, they call upon all their Philippine sons, without distinction of class, to unite firmly together for the purpose of forming a society of nobility, not nobility of birth or pompous titles, but of work and personal merit of each one—a free society, where there shall be no egotism and personal politics that crush and annihilate, no envy and favoritism that debase, no bragging and charlatanry that make ridiculous.

And it could not be otherwise; a people which has given proofs of valor and long suffering in time of trouble and danger, and of industry and diligence in time of peace, is not intended for slavery; such a people is called to be great, to be one of the strongest arms of Providence to direct the destinies of humanity; such a people has sufficient resources and energy to free itself from the ruin and annihilation into which the Spanish Government has plunged it, and to claim a modest but honorable seat in the concert of free nations.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

AGUINALDO'S PROCLAMATION OF JUNE 23, ESTABLISHING THE REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT.

No. 3.

Don Emilio Aguinaldo y Famy, president of the revolutionary government of the Philippines and general in chief of its army.

This government desiring to demonstrate to the Philippine people that one of its ends is to combat with a firm hand the inveterate vices of the Spanish administration, substituting for personal luxury and that pompous ostentation which have made it a mere matter of routine, cumbrous and slow in its movements, another administration more modest, simple, and prompt in performing the public service, I decree as follows:

* * * * * * *

Given at Cavite the 23d of June, 1898.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

INSTRUCTIONS.

Desiring to bring about a proper execution of the decree dated the 23d of the present month, and to provide that the administrative measures shall not result hereafter in the paralysis of public business, but that, on the contrary, it shall constitute the best guaranty of the regularity, promptitude, and fitness in the transaction of public business, I give the following instructions and decree:

(Then follow 10 rules concerning the details of installing the government.)

Cavite, the 27th of June, 1898.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

To foreign governments:

The revolutionary government of the Philippines on its establishment explained through the message dated the 23d of June last the true causes of the Philippine revolution, showing according to the evidence that this popular movement is the result of the laws which regulate the life of a people which aspire to progress and to perfection by the sole road of liberty.

The said revolution now rules in the provinces of Cavite, Batangas, Mindoro, Tayabas, Laguna, Morong, Bulacan, Bataan, Pampanga, Nueva-Ecija, Tarlac, Pangasinan, Union, Infanta, and Zambales, and it holds besieged the capital of Manila.

In these provinces complete order and perfect tranquillity reign, administered by the authorities elected by the provinces in accordance with the organic decrees dated 18th and 23d of June last.

The revolution holds, moreover, about 9,000 prisoners of war, who are treated in accordance with the customs of war between civilized nations and humane sentiments, and at the end of the war it has more than 30,000 combatants organized in the form of a regular army.

In this situation the chiefs of the towns comprised in the above-mentioned provinces, interpreting the sentiments which animate those who have elected them, have proclaimed the independence of the Philippines, petitioning the revolutionary government that it will entreat and obtain from foreign governments recognition of its belligerency and its independence in the firm belief that the Philippine people have already arrived at that state in which they can and ought to govern themselves.

This is set forth in the accompanying documents subscribed by the above-named chiefs.

Wherefore the undersigned, by virtue of the powers which belong to him as president of the revolutionary government of the Philippines and in the name and representation of the Philippine people, asks the support of all the powers of the civilized world and earnestly entreats them to proceed to the formal recognition of the belligerency of the revolution and the independence of the Philippines, since they are the means designated by Providence to maintain the equilibrium between peoples, sustaining the weak and restraining the strong, to the end that by these means shall shine forth and be realized the most complete justice in the indefinite progress of humanity.

Given at Bacoor, in the province of Cavite, the 6th day of August, 1898.

The president of the revolutionary government.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

STATEMENT.

The undersigned chiefs of towns comprising the provinces hereinafter named, elected as such in the manner prescribed by the decree of the 18th and the instructions dated the 20th of June last, after having been confirmed in their respective offices by the president of the government and having taken the prescribed oath before him, have met in full assembly previously called for that purpose, for the purpose of discussing the solemn proclamation of Philippine independence.

The discussion took place with the prudence and at the length which so important a question demands, and after suitable deliberation the following declarations were unanimously adopted.

The Philippine revolution records, on the one hand, brilliant feats of arms, realized with singular courage by an improvised army almost without arms, and, on the other, the no less notable fact that the people after the combat have not entered upon great excesses nor pursued the enemy further, but have treated him on the contrary with generosity and humanity, returning at once to their ordinary and tranquil life.

Such deeds demonstrate in an indisputable manner that the Philippine people was not created, as all believed, for the sole purpose of dragging the chains of servitude, but that it has a perfect idea of order and justice, shuns a savage life, and loves a civilized life.

But what is most supprising in this people is that it goes on giving proofs that it knows how to frame laws commensurate with the progress of the age, to respect them and obey them, demonstrating that its national customs are not repugnant to this progress; that it is not ambitious for power, nor honors, nor riches, aside from the rational and just aspirations for a free and independent life and inspired by the most lofty idea of patriotism and national honor; and that in the service of this idea and for the realization of that aspiration it has not hesitated in the sacrifice of life and fortune.

These admirable—and more than admirable, these wonderful—deeds necessarily engender the most firm and ineradicable convictions of the necessity of leaving the Philippines free and independent, not only because they desire it, but because they are prepared to defend to the death their future and their history.

Filipinos are fully convinced that if individuals have need of material, moral, and intellectual perfection in order to contribute to the welfare of their fellows, peoples require to have fullness of life; they need liberty and independence in order to contribute to the indefinite progress of mankind. It has struggled and will struggle with decision and constance, without ever turning back or retrograding before the obstacles which may arise in its path, and with unshakable faith that it will obtain justice and fulfill the laws of Providence.

And neither will it be turned aside from the course it has hitherto followed by the unjustifiable imprisonment, tortures, assassinations, and the other vandal acts committed by the Spaniards against the persons of peaceful and defenseless Filipinos. The Spaniards believe themselves released from every legal obligation toward the Filipinos, for the sole reason that the belligerency of the revolution has not been recognized, taking no account of the fact that over and above every law, whether written or prescriptive, are placed with imprescriptible characters culture, national honor, and humanity. No, the Filipinos have no need ever to make use of reprisals, because they seek independence with culture, liberty with unconditional respect for the law as the organ of justice, and a name purified in the crucible of human sentiment.

In virtue of the foregoing considerations the undersigned, giving voice to the unanimous aspiration of the people whom they represent and performing the offices received from them and the duties pertaining to the powers with which they are invested—

Proclaim solemnly, in the face of the whole world, the independence of the Philippines;

Recognize and respect Señor Don Emilio Aguinaldo y Famy as president of the revolutionary government organized in the manner prescribed by decree of the 23d and instructions of the 27th of June last, and beg the said president that he will ask and obtain from foreign governments the recognition of its belligerency and independence, not only because this act constitutes a duty of justice, but also because to no one is permitted to contravene natural laws nor stifle the legitimate aspiration of a people for its amelioration and dignification.

Given in the province of Cavite the 1st day of August of the year of our Lord 1898, and the first year of the Philippine independence.

Follow the signatures of the local presidents of the provinces, of Cavite, and many others.

* * * * * * * *

The undersigned, secretary of the interior, certifies that the present document is a literal copy of the original, which is deposited in the secretaryship under his charge; in proof of which he signs it with the approval of the president of the revolutionary government in Bacoor the 6th day of August, 1898.

El Presidente del G. R.,

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

El Secretario del Interior,

LEANDRO IBARRA.

Letter of Consul-General Wildman to the Secretary of State:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Hongkong, August 8, 1898.

SIR:

* * * * * * * *

Aguinaldo has written me by every opportunity, and I believe that he has been frank with me regarding both his actions and his motives. I do not doubt but that he would like to be President of the Philippine Republic, and there may be a small coterie of his native advisers who entertain a like ambition, but I am perfectly certain that the great majority of his followers, and all the wealthy educated Filipinos have but one desire—to become citizens of the United States of America. As for the mass of uneducated natives, they would be content under any rule save that of the friars.

My correspondence with Aguinaldo has been strictly of a personal nature, and I have missed no opportunity to remind him of his antebellum promises. His letters are childish, and he is far more interested in the kind of cane he will carry or the breastplate he will wear than in the figure he will make in history. The demands that he and his junta here have made upon my time is excessive and most tiresome. He is a man of petty moods, and I have repeatedly had letters from Consul Williams requesting me to write to Aguinaldo a friendly letter congratulating him on his success and reminding him of his obligations.

I do not care to quote Admiral Dewey, as his letters are all of a strictly personal nature, but I feel perfectly free to refer you to him as to my attitude and actions. I do not say this because I feel that I need to make any defense, but because I believe that the Daily Mail, to which you refer in the above telegram, has misconstrued my attitude, and placed me in a false position.

I find on investigation that the letter you refer to as published in the London Mail was a personal one, written by me on July 25, at the request of Consul Williams, and on lines with which we have been working with Aguinaldo from the first. Aguinaldo had for some weeks been getting what Admiral Dewey called a "big head," and writing me sulky, childish letters. In consequence I wrote him in part as follows:

"If you stand shoulder to shoulder with our forces and do not allow any small differences of opinion and fancied slights to keep you from the one set purpose of freeing your island from the cruelties under which you claim it has been groaning for so many hundred years, your name in history will be a glorious one. There are greater prizes in the world than being a mere chief of a revolution. Do not forget that the United States undertook this war for the sole purpose of relieving the Cubans from the cruelties under which they were suffering, and not for the love of conquest or the hope of gain. Whatever the final disposition of the conquered territory may be, you can trust to the United States that justice and honor will control all their dealings with you. The first thing is to throw off the Spanish yoke. Do not let anything interfere with this."

If the newspapers can make anything out of this personal letter that looks like a pledge or an assumption on my part of powers that are not vested in me, I must decline to accept their interpretation, and insomuch as Aguinaldo himself does not so construe it, I trust the Department will not consider that I have exceeded the bounds of discretion or embarrassed the Department in any way.

I have the honor, etc.,

ROUNSEVELLE WILDMAN,
Consul-General.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE,
UNITED STATES EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
Cavite Arsenal, P. I., July 4, 1898.

Señor Don EMILIO AGUINALDO,
Commanding Philippine Forces, Cavite, Luzon.

GENERAL: I have the honor to inform you that the United States of America, whose land forces I have the honor to command in this vicinity, being at war with the Kingdom of Spain, has entire sympathy and most friendly sentiments for the native people of the Philippine Islands.

For these reasons I desire to have the most amicable relations with you, and to have you and your people cooperate with us in military operations against the Spanish forces.

In our operations it has become necessary for us to occupy the town of Cavite as a base of operations. In doing this, I do not wish to interfere with your residence here and the exercise by yourself and other native citizens of all functions and privileges not inconsistent with military rule.

I would be pleased to be informed at once of any misconduct of soldiers under my command, as it is the intention of my Government to maintain order, and to treat all citizens with justice, courtesy, and kindness.

I have, therefore, the honor to ask your excellency to instruct your officials not to interfere with my officers in the performance of their duties and not to assume that they can not visit Cavite without permission.

Assuring you again of my most friendly sentiment and distinguished consideration, I am, with all respect,

THOMAS M. ANDERSON,
Brigadier-General, U. S. Volunteers, Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS EXPEDITIONARY FORCES TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS,
CHIEF QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
Cavite, P. I., July 17, 1898.

Gen. EMILIO AGUINALDO, Addressed.

SIR: General Anderson wishes me to say that the second expedition having arrived, he expects to encamp in the vicinity of Paranaque from 5,000 to 7,000 men. To do this, supply this army and shelter, it will require certain assistance from the Filipinos in this neighborhood. We will want horses, buffaloes, carts, etc., for transportation, bamboo for shelter, wood to cook with, etc.

For all this we are willing to pay a fair price, but no more. We find so far that the native population are not willing to give us this assistance as promptly as required. But we must have it, and if it becomes necessary we will be compelled to send out parties to seize what we may need. We would regret very much to do this, as we are here to befriend the Filipinos. Our nation has spent millions of money to send forces here to expel the Spaniards and to give a good government to the whole people, and the return we are asking is comparatively slight.

General Anderson wishes you to inform your people that we are here for their good, and that they must supply us with labor and material at the current market prices.

We are prepared to purchase 500 horses at a fair price, but can not undertake to bargain for horses with each individual man.

I regret very much that I am unable to see you personally, as it is of the utmost importance that these arrangements should be made as soon as possible.

I will await your reply.

SAM R. JONES,
Major and Quartermaster, U. S. Volunteers, Chief Quartermaster.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE,
UNITED STATES EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
Cavite Arsenal, Philippine Islands, July 19, 1898.

Señor Don EMILIO AGUINALDO,
Commanding General, Philippine Forces.

GENERAL: The bearer, Maj. J. F. Bell, U. S. A., was sent by Maj. Gen. Wesley Merritt, U. S. A., to collect for him, by the time of his personal arrival, certain information concerning the strength and positions of the enemy and concerning the topography of the country surrounding Manila.

I would be obliged if you would permit him to see your maps and place at his disposal any information you may have on the above subjects, and also give him a letter or pass addressed to your subordinates which will authorize them to furnish him any information they can on these subjects, and to facilitate his passage along the lines upon a reconnoissance around Manila on which I propose to send him.

I remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

THOMAS M. ANDERSON,
Brigadier-General, U. S. Volunteers, Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE,
UNITED STATES EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
Cavite Arsenal, P. I., July 21, 1898.

Señor Don EMILIO AGUINALDO,
Commanding General, Philippine Forces.

GENERAL: I have the honor to request that passes and such other assistance as practicable be given to the bearer, Lieut. E. J. Bryan, and party, who are making a reconnoissance of the surrounding country.

Thanking you for assistance given on previous occasions,

I remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

Brigadier-General, U. S. Volunteers, Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE,
UNITED STATES EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
Cavite Arsenal, P. I., July 23, 1898.

Señor Don EMILIO AGUINALDO,
Commanding Philippine Forces.

GENERAL: When I came here three weeks ago I requested your excellency to give what assistance you could to procure means of transportation for the American Army, as it was to fight in the cause of your people. So far we have received no response.

As you represent your people, I now have the honor to make requisition on you for 500 horses and 50 oxen and ox carts.

If you can not secure these, I will have to pass you and make requisition directly on the people.

I beg leave to request an answer at your earliest convenience.

I remain, with great respect,

THOMAS M. ANDERSON,
Brigadier-General, U. S. Volunteers, Commanding.

AUGUST 10, 1898.

INSTRUCTIONS FROM GENERAL MERRITT BROUGHT BY GENERAL BABCOCK.

1. No rupture with insurgents. This is imperative. Can ask insurgent generals or Aguinaldo for permission to occupy their trenches, but if refused not to use force.

2. No extensions of lines, as proposed in memorandum of August 9, which will bring partial engagement, resulting in loss prior to general assault.

3. One gun can be placed within two hours after receiving the order in the insurgent emplacement on the road facing No. 14; not as good a position as farther to the front and right. Three more guns can be placed behind trench near the beach without precipitating an engagement. Embrasures can be cut through trenches to-night.

4. Troops can occupy trenches on two hours' notice, but are not prepared to make a determined assault without carrying out memorandum of August 9, requiring three days. We can hold trenches against any possible attack and bring 8 field guns into action in front of enemy's lines.

True copy.

Special.] CRUISER BALTIMORE,
CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
MANILA BAY, OPPOSITE CAVITE,
Manila, P. I., May 12, 1898.

SIR: To aid you, if possible, permit me to give assurance of the friendliness of the Philippine natives to our country and to me as its representative.

During the period of my residence in Manila every week was a history of barbarities by Spaniards and of efforts, often futile, of the natives to obtain rights and protect their homes.

Scores of times I have heard hopes expressed that either United States or Great Britain would acquire these islands. In all this foreign residents, other than Spanish, concurred, and all such classes are most friendly to me.

In the struggle between Spain and the insurgents the deaths have been many, and greater among the natives. First, because the Spaniards have been much better armed; second, because the Spaniards killed many noncombatants—old men, women, and children—while the natives refrained from such barbarities.

From concensus of opinions of many reliable people, I estimate Spanish forces here about as follows:

First. Naval force, in ships annihilated in the notable battle of Manila Bay, in which 10 Spanish war ships were burned and sunk, 2 auxiliary gunboats ditto, and about 30 steamers, schooners, tugs, etc., captured.

Second. About 4,000 Spanish infantry, nearly a half of whom are in hospitals.

Third. About 6,000 native troops under Spanish officers, but if such officers were deported their soldiers would eagerly follow our flag.

An insurgent leader, Major Gonzales, reported to me last week on the Olympia, that they had 37,000 troops under arms, good and bad, surrounding Manila, endeavoring to cooperate with us. In the main they are very poorly armed, but have about 6,600 rifles taken from the Spaniards. They have captured the entire railroad line and the River Pasig, thus cutting off supply lines, while we by cutting off supply by bay and sea can soon starve Manila into surrender.

These natives are eager to be organized and led by United States officers, and the members of their cabinet visited me and gave assurance that all would swear allegiance to and cheerfully follow our flag. They are brave, submissive, and cheaply provided for.

To show their friendliness for me as our nation's only representative in this part of the world, I last week went on shore at Cavite with British consul, in his launch, to show the destruction wrought by our fleet. As soon as natives found me out, they crowded around me, hats off, shouting "Viva los Americanos," thronged about me by hundreds to shake either hand, even several at a time, men, women, and children, striving to get even a finger to shake. So I moved half a mile, shaking continuously with both hands. The British consul, a smiling spectator, said he never before saw such an evidence of friendship. Two thousand escorted me to the launch amid hurrahs of good feeling for our nation, hence I must conclude:

First. Our squadron can force surrender in a day. Spaniards are all cooped up in Manila.

Second. Spanish officers of native regiments away, these 6,000, together with selections from the 37,000 insurgents, can give us ample land forces and can be well armed with rifles of Spanish soldiers and from barracks and arsenals.

Third. Few United States troops will be needed for conquest and fewer still for occupancy. Expulsion of Spaniards—naval, civil, military, and clerics—will remove all discord and danger, and civil government, crude in the beginning but better than the present, will be easy and be well received, while native priests, of which there are many, can fully and with perfect acceptability meet all religious requirements so far as present established religion is concerned.

All natives, all foreigners other than Spanish, and certain Spaniards in mercantile and retired life will aid us to every extent. The people crave a change of flag. Hence I believe ample assurances are at hand that civil government by us will be easy of organization and gratefully received by the people.

My communications to your department are, these war days, supra consular, but on other lines I endeavor to serve our fleet and thus serve our nation.

All rejoice over the merited promotion of our commodore to the rank of rear-admiral, but every man of the fleet proved a hero, and it seems as if the shield of Providence warded off the enemy's shot, leaving our men unharmed, our ships and guns intact, and gave us the most important and unique victory of history.

The student of the next century will read with pride that the right arm of Spain was broken at the battle of Manila Bay, and from this must come the acquisition of the islands, many times more extensive, more populous, and more valuable than Cuba, or else their capture will force Spain to conditions of peace on basis of honor, so much sought by our nation.

I have, etc.,

OSCAR F. WILLIAMS,
United States Consul.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
MANILA BAY, OFF CAVITE,
Manila, P. I., May 24, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to report successful efforts on the part of the insurgents of these islands in preparation for more successful war against Spain.

Officers have visited me during the darkness of night to inform the fleet and me of their operations and to report increase of strength.

At a conference with General Aguinaldo, the head of the movement, I was told that they had now above 4,500 Mauser rifles taken from the Spaniards, and had also abundant ammunition. Until the present they have been fatally crippled in these respects.

Last week Major Gonzales captured two buffalo cart loads of rifle ammunition from the Spaniards. To-day I executed a power of attorney whereby General Aguinaldo releases to his attorneys in fact $400,000, now in bank in Hongkong, so that money therefrom can pay for 3,000 stand of arms bought there and expected here to-morrow.

The same sources informed me that about 37,000 insurgents stand ready to aid United States forces, and General Aguinaldo's headquarters were this morning at 7 o'clock surrounded by 500 to 1,000 men eager to enlist. I was there at that hour and saw the men.

My relations with all are cordial, and I manage to keep them so pro bono publico.

When General Merritt arrives he will find large auxiliary land forces adapted to his service and used to this climate.

I am, sir,

OSCAR F. WILLIAMS,
United States Consul.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Day.

Special.] U. S. S. BALTIMORE,
CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Manila, P. I., June 16, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to report that since our squadron destroyed the Spanish fleet on May 1, the insurgent forces have been most active and almost uniformly successful in their many encounters with the crown forces of Spain. Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, the insurgent chief, who was deported late in 1897, returned recently to Cavite and resumed direction of insurgent forces. He is not permitted by his people to personally lead in battle, but from headquarters governs all military movements.

He told me to-day that since his return his forces had captured nearly 5,000 prisoners, nearly 4,000 of whom were Spaniards, and all of whom had rifles when taken. General Aguinaldo has now about 10,500 rifles and 8 field pieces, with 8,000 more rifles, 2 Maxim guns, and a dynamite gun bought in China and now in transit. The insurgents have defeated the Spaniards at all points except at fort near Matate, and hold not only North Luzon to the suburbs of Manila, but Batanyes Province also and the bay coast entire, save the city of Manila.

While the Spaniards cruelly and barbarously slaughter Filipinos taken in arms, and often noncombatants, women, and children, the insurgent victors, following American example, spare life, protect the helpless, and nurse, feed, and care for Spaniards taken prisoners and for Spanish wounded as kindly as they care for the wounded fallen from their own ranks.

* * * * * * *

It has been my effort to maintain harmony with insurgents in order to exercise greater influence hereafter when we reorganize government.

Manila is hemmed in; foreigners other than Spaniards have, by kindness of Rear-Admiral Dewey, been allowed to leave the beleaguered city and are cared for on merchant ships in the bay.

I have the honor, etc.,

OSCAR F. WILLIAMS,
United States Consul.

Mr. Wildman to Mr. Day.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Hongkong, July 18, 1898.

SIR:

* * * * * * *

There has been a systematic attempt to blacken the name of Aguinaldo and his cabinet, on account of the questionable terms of their surrender to Spanish forces a year ago this month. It has been said that they sold their country for gold, but this has been conclusively disproved, not only by their own statements but by the speech of the late Governor-General Rivera in the Spanish Senate June 11, 1898. He said that Aguinaldo undertook to submit if the Spanish Government would give a certain sum to the widows and orphans of the insurgents. He then admits that only a tenth part of this sum was ever given to Aguinaldo, and that the other promises made he did not find it expedient to keep.

I was in Hongkong September, 1897, when Aguinaldo and his leaders arrived under contract with the Spanish Government. They waited until the 1st of November for the payment of the promised money and the fulfillment of the promised reforms. Only $400,000, Mexican, was ever placed to their credit in the banks, and on the 3d of November Mr. F. Agoncillo, late minister of foreign affairs in Aguinaldo's cabinet, called upon me and made a proposal which I transmitted to the State Department in my dispatch No. 19, dated November 3, 1897. In reply the State Department instructed me "to courteously decline to communicate with the Department further regarding the alleged mission." I obeyed these instructions to the letter until the breaking out of the war, when, after consultation with Admiral Dewey, I received a delegation from the insurgent junta, and they bound themselves to obey all laws of civilized warfare and to place themselves absolutely under the orders of Admiral Dewey if they were permitted to return to Manila. At this time their president, Aguinaldo, was in Singapore negotiating, through Consul-General Pratt, with Admiral Dewey for his return.

On April 27, in company with Consul O. F. Williams, we received another delegation, composed of Señor Sandigo, José Maria Basa, Tomas Mascardo, Lorenzo L. Zialcita, Andres E. de Garchitorena, Manuel Malvar, Mariano Llanza, Salvatore Estrella. We agreed on behalf of Dewey to allow two of their number to accompany the fleet to Manila; consequently on the same day I took in the tug Fame Alizandrino and Garchitorena, accompanied by Mr. Sandigo, to the Olympia in Mirs Bay. On May 2 Aguinaldo arrived in Hongkong and immediately called on me. It was May 16 before I could obtain permission from Admiral Dewey to allow Aguinaldo to go by the United States ship McCulloch, and I put him aboard in the night so as to save any complications with the local Government. Immediately on the arrival of Aguinaldo at Cavite he issued a proclamation, which I had outlined for him before he left, forbidding pillage, and making it a criminal offense to maltreat neutrals.

He, of course, organized a government of which he was dictator, an absolutely necessary step if he hoped to maintain control over the natives, and from that date until the present time he has been uninterruptedly successful in the field and dignified and just as the head of his government. According to his own statements to me by letter, he has been approached by both the Spaniards and the Germans, and has had tempting offers made him by the Catholic Church. He has been watched very closely by Admiral Dewey, Consul Williams, and his own junta here in Hongkong, and nothing of moment has occurred which would lead any one to believe that he was not carrying out to the letter the promises made to me in this consulate.

The insurgents are fighting for freedom from the Spanish rule, and rely upon the well-known sense of justice that controls all the actions of our Government as to their future.

In conclusion, I wish to put myself on record as stating that the insurgent government of the Philippine Islands can not be dealt with as though they were North American Indians, willing to be removed from one reservation to another at the whim of their masters. If the United States decides not to retain the Philippine Islands, its 10,000,000 people will demand independence, and the attempt of any foreign nation to obtain territory or coaling stations will be resisted with the same spirit with which they fought the Spaniards.

I have the honor, etc.,

ROUNSEVELLE WILDMAN,
Consul-General.

[From report of General Bell, prepared for the Peace Commission.]

In the city of Santa Cruz, the capital of La Laguna, about 600 Spaniards are besieged by insurgents.

Albay, held by a detachment of Spanish forces, number not known, is also besieged by insurgents.

All the Spanish in the province of Tayabas have just been captured by insurgents, together with a considerable amount of money and other property.

The Spanish still hold Daet, the capital of Camarines Norte, and Nueva Caceres, the capital of Camarines Sur, but both places are besieged by insurgents.

The four provinces, Llocos Sur, Llocos Norte, Isabella, and Cagayan, are still in the possession of the Spanish, but 400 insurgents have been dispatched to attack the Spanish in these provinces.

About 250 Spaniards hold Morong, the capital of the province of the same name.

There is one company of Spanish infantry in Yap, the capital of Ponape, one of the Caroline Islands.

There are also a considerable number of Spanish troops in Cebu, Iloilo, Leyte, and Mindanao.

The island of Mindoro and the provinces of Batangas, Pampangas, Pangasenan, Bulacan, La Union, Tayabas, Bataan, Zanbales, Tarlac, and Cavite (all in the island of Luzon) are under the control of insurgents.

Concerning the insurgents now under arms and about the city, it is practically impossible to count or estimate their number for several reasons: First, they are being continually sent away to other provinces; second, many of them have laid aside their arms temporarily to raise crops for their families. As the organization is very loose, no captain knows the exact number of his following. No reports have ever been made to General Aguinaldo. The closest estimate that can be made of the available armed insurgent force is based upon the number of arms recently captured from the Spanish militia, from the arsenal at Cavite, from Spaniards captured in battle, and bought from Jackson and Evans. Together with the number it is fair to estimate were in the hands of Filipinos, who got them in previous insurrection, this foots up about 40,000, as follows:

From militia	12,000
From arsenal	2,500
From Jackson and Evans	2,000
From Spanish	8,000
In hands of Filipinos (about)	15,000
Total	39,500

From this number there should probably be deducted several thousand guns recaptured by the Spanish and turned in under the provisions of a proclamation offering $50 and amnesty to each insurgent who would come in and give himself and his rifle up to the Spaniards.

[Memorandum of General Bell on correspondence between Aguinaldo and General Merritt.]

NOTE OF EXPLANATION.—No positions whatever, with a possible exception of Paco (San Fernando de Dilao), were conquered within the city limits by Aguinaldo's forces. Definite information can be procured of General MacArthur as to whether the insurgents or our forces forced the Spanish to retire from that place.

The Calzada a Aviles merges at the crossroads (where there is really a round open space, with a fountain in the center, and called the Plaza de Rotondo) into the road to Santa Mesa, marked on the map "A Mariquina," to which place it also goes. The First Colorado Regiment has a picket post on this road a half mile beyond the limit mentioned by Aguinaldo.

I gather from the statements of many naval officers that Aguinaldo was invited here and given much assistance and encouragement by Admiral Dewey, who, of course, did not anticipate any complication, and probably never supposed Aguinaldo would at once assume an independence of American control. He has been much concerned and displeased by Aguinaldo's course of conduct, and told me several days ago that he had ceased to recognize him in any way, and had refused to any longer receive his representatives. This prayer to you to "reclaim" Admiral Dewey's protection is doubtless due to this change of attitude on the Admiral's part, who, if permitted to follow his own inclinations, will not only grant Aguinaldo no protection, but will seize his boats and launches at the first overt act.

Attention is invited to General Merritt's promise (page —), made known to Aguinaldo by me verbally, namely, that in the event of the United States withdrawing from these islands, care would be taken to leave Aguinaldo in as good condition as he was found by the forces of the Government. From a remark the general made to me I inferred he intended to interpret the expression "forces of the Government" to mean the naval forces, should future contingencies necessitate such an interpretation. At the time of the entry of the American forces into Manila, which was accomplished without assistance from the insurgents being either needed, requested, received, or desired, the insurgents held the following lines: Joining onto the American trenches facing Mytubig (the Indian name for the locality at the south end of Malate, in the vicinity of the old fort and bridge), their trenches extended in a large circle around and outside of the Spanish line of blockhouses.

The Spanish held Santa Ana, Concordia, Paco, Cingalon, and Malate; then the line dropped back to blockhouse No. 8, to Macleod's house in Santa Mesa, and continued on around to the bay at Bancu Say, including within it all the suburbs on the northern side of Manila. The lines are indicated in map accompanying my report of July 27. Paranaque, Pasay, San Pedro Macati-Mandaloian, Pasig, Guadalupe, Partero Santalon (where is situated the pumping station), San Juan del Monte (where the reservoir is located), Kabao, Santol, San Francisco del Monte, Caloocan, and Malaben are the villages, towns, and places (immediately in rear of the insurgent trenches and positions) where the insurgent forces were generally located.

After our entry to the city they all advanced their positions and encroached upon our outposts without anyone's authority or permission save their own, and in the face of repeated objections on the part of General Merritt. They can lay no just claim to having conquered from the Spanish the positions now held, except those at the pumping station and reservoir. Prior to the 13th of August they had for weeks been straining every resource in an effort to capture Manila without the assistance of Americans, and before they got ready, without making the slightest progress. Of course, they could never have made the progress they did in investing the city had it not been for the destruction of the Spanish fleet by Admiral Dewey; but they did do much hard fighting and did drive the Spanish from positions in the provinces immediately surrounding Manila into the confines of the city itself. This credit they are entitled to.

[From report prepared by Maj. Gen. F. V. Greene for information of Peace Commissioners.]

The day of reckoning for three centuries of this sort of government came when Admiral Dewey destroyed the Spanish squadron on May 1, 1898. An insurrection had been in progress from August, 1896, to December, 1897. Unable to suppress it, the Government made a written treaty with the insurgent leaders, paying them a large sum of money and promising to introduce various reforms on condition that they would leave the country. Hardly had the Spanish officials recovered from this when the appalling disaster of the destruction of their fleet occurred under their very eyes.

Then followed in rapid succession the naval blockade, the arrival of the insurgent leaders from Hongkong, the raising of an insurgent army, which blockaded Manila on the land side, and finally the American troops. At the end of one hundred and four days after the destruction of the Spanish fleet the city surrendered to a combined land and naval attack of the American forces.

* * * * * * *

The Spanish officials have intense fear of the insurgents, and the latter hate them, as well as the friars, with a virulence that can hardly be described. They have fought them with success and almost without interruption for two years, and they will continue to fight them with increased vigor and still greater prospects of success if any attempt is made to restore the Spanish government. In its present disorganized condition the Spanish Government could not successfully cope with them; on the other hand, it would not surrender to them. The result, therefore, of an attempted restoration of Spanish power in any of the islands would simply be civil war and anarchy, leading inevitably and speedily to intervention by foreign nations whose subjects have property in the islands which they would not allow to be destroyed.

Insurgent troops.—It is very difficult to give exact figures for the numbers of insurgent troops. In his message to foreign governments of August 6, asking for recognition of belligerency and independence, Aguinaldo claims to have a force of 30,000 men, organized into a regular army. This included the force in the provinces of Luzon outside of Manila. What was in evidence around Manila varied from 10,000 to 15,000. They were composed of young men and boys, some as young as 15 years of age, recruited in the rural districts, having no property and nothing to lose in a civil war. They have received no pay, and although Aguinaldo speaks in his proclamation of his intention and ability to maintain order wherever his forces penetrate, yet the feeling is practically universal among the rank and file that they are to be compensated for their time and services and hardships by looting Manila.

Their equipment consists of a gun, bayonet, and cartridge box; their uniform of a straw hat, gingham shirt and trousers, and bare feet; their transportation of a few ponies and carts, impressed for a day or a week at a time; for quarters they have taken the public building in each village or pueblo, locally known as the Tribunal, and the churches and convents. From these, details are sent out to man the trenches. Their food while on duty consists of rice and banana leaves, cooked at the quarters and sent out to the trenches. After a few days or a week of active service they return to their homes to feed up or to work on their farms, their places being taken by others, to whom they turn over their guns and cartridges.

Their arms have been obtained from various sources—from purchases in Hongkong; from the supply which Admiral Dewey found in the arsenal at Cavite; from capture made from the Spaniards. They are partly Mausers and partly Remingtons. Their ammunition was obtained in the same way. They have used it freely, and the supply is now rather short. To replenish it they have established a cartridge factory at the village of Imus, about 10 miles south of Cavite, where they have 400 people engaged in reloading cartridges with powder and lead found at Cavite or purchased abroad. They have no artillery, except a few antique columbiads obtained from Cavite, and no cavalry. Their method of warfare is to dig a trench in front of the Spanish position, cover it with mats as a protection against the sun and rain, and during the night put their guns on top of the trench above their heads and fire in the general direction of the enemy. When their ammunition is exhausted, they go off in a body to get a fresh supply in baskets, and then return to the trenches.

The men are of small stature, from 5 feet to 5 feet 6 inches in height, and weigh from 110 to 130 pounds. Compared with them, our men from Colorado and California seemed like a race of giants. One afternoon, just as we entered Manila, a battalion of the insurgents fired upon the outposts of the Colorado regiment, mistaking them, as they claimed, for Spaniards. The outpost retreated to their support and the Filipinos followed; they easily fell into an ambush, and the support, numbering about 80 men, surrounded the 250 Filipinos, wrenched the guns out of their hands, and marched them off as unarmed prisoners, all in the space of a few minutes. Such a force can hardly be called an army, and yet the service which it has rendered should not be underestimated. Between 2,000 and 3,000 Spanish native troops surrendered to it during the months of June and July. It constantly annoyed and harassed the Spaniards in the trenches, keeping them up at night and wearing them out with fatigue; and it invested Manila early in July so completely that all supplies were cut off and the inhabitants, as well as the Spanish troops, were forced to live on horse and buffalo meat, and the Chinese population on cats and dogs. It captured the waterworks of Manila and cut off the water supply, and if it had been in the dry season, would have inflicted great suffering on the inhabitants for lack of water.

These results, it is true, were obtained against a dispirited army containing a considerable number of native troops of doubtful loyalty. Yet from August, 1896, to April, 1897, they fought 25,000 of the best regular troops sent out from Spain, inflicting on them a loss of over 150 officers and 2,500 men killed and wounded, and they suffered still greater losses themselves. Nevertheless, from daily contact with them for six weeks, I am very confident that no such results could have been obtained against an American army, which would have driven them back to the hills and reduced them to a petty guerrilla warfare. If they attack the American army this will certainly be the result; and while these guerrilla bands might give some trouble so long as their ammunition lasted, yet with our navy guarding the coasts and our army pursuing them on land, it would not be long before they were reduced to subjection.

Insurgent civil administration.—In August, 1896, an insurrection broke out in Cavite under the leadership of Emilio Aguinaldo, and soon spread to other provinces on both sides of Manila. It continued with varying successes on both sides, and the trial and execution of numerous insurgents, until December, 1897, when the governor-general, Primo de Rivera, entered into written agreement with Aguinaldo, the substance of the document, which is in possession of Señor Felipe Agoncillo, who accompanies me to Washington, being attached hereto and marked "A." In brief, it required that Aguinaldo and the other insurgent leaders should leave the country, the Government agreeing to pay them $800,000 in silver and promising to introduce numerous reforms, including representation in the Spanish Cortes, freedom of the press, general amnesty for all insurgents, and the expulsion of secularization of the monastic orders.

Aguinaldo and his associates went to Hongkong and Singapore. A portion of the money ($400,000) was deposited in banks at Hongkong, and a lawsuit soon arose between Aguinaldo and one of his subordinate chiefs named Artacho, which is interesting on account of the very honorable position taken by Aguinaldo. Artacho sued for a division of the money among the insurgents according to rank. Aguinaldo claimed that the money was a trust fund, and was to remain on deposit until it was seen whether the Spaniards would carry out their promised reforms, and if they failed to do so it was to be used to defray the expenses of a new insurrection. The suit was settled out of court by paying Artacho $5,000.

No steps have been taken to introduce the reforms, more than 2,000 insurgents, who had been deported to Fernando Po and other places, are still in confinement, and Aguinaldo is now using the money to carry on the operations of the present insurrection.

On the 24th day of April Aguinaldo met the United States consul and others at Singapore and offered to begin a new insurrection in conjunction with the operations of the United States Navy at Manila. This was telegraphed to Admiral Dewey, and by his consent, or at his request, Aguinaldo left Singapore for Hongkong on April 26; and when the McCulloch went to Hongkong early in May to carry the news of Admiral Dewey's victory it took Aguinaldo and 17 other revolutionary chiefs on board and brought them to Manila Bay. They soon after landed at Cavite, and the Admiral allowed them to take such guns, ammunition, and stores as he did not require for himself. With these, and some other arms which he had brought from Hongkong, Aguinaldo armed his followers, who rapidly assembled at Cavite, and in a few weeks he began moving against the Spaniards. Part of them surrendered, giving him more arms, and the others retreated to Manila.

Soon afterwards two ships, which were the private property of Senor Agoncillo and other insurgent sympathizers, were converted into cruisers and sent with insurgent troops to Subig Bay and other places to capture provinces outside of Manila. They were very successful, the native militia in Spanish service capitulating with their arms in nearly every case without serious resistance. On the 18th of June Aguinaldo issued a proclamation from Cavite establishing a dictatorial government, with himself as dictator. In each village or pueblo a chief (jefe) was to be elected, and in each ward a headman (cabeza); also in each pueblo 3 delegates—1 of police, 1 of justice, and 1 of taxes. These were to constitute the junta or assembly, and after consulting the junta the chiefs of pueblos were to elect a chief of province and 3 councillors—1 of police, 1 of justice, and 1 of taxes. They were also to elect one or more representatives from each province to form the revolutionary congress.

This was followed on June 20 by a decree giving more detailed instructions in regard to the elections. On June 23 another decree followed changing the title of the government from dictatorial to revolutionary, and of the chief officer from dictator to president; announcing a cabinet, with a minister of foreign affairs, marine, and commerce, another of war and public works, another of police and internal order, justice, instruction, and hygiene, and another of taxes, agriculture, and manufactures; the powers of the president and congress were defined, and a code of military justice was formulated.

On the same date a manifesto was issued to the world explaining the reasons and purposes of the revolution. On June 27 another decree was issued containing instructions in regard to elections. On August 6 an address was issued to foreign governments stating that the revolutionary government was in operation and control in 15 provinces, and that in response to the petition of the duly elected chiefs of these provinces an appeal is made for recognition of belligerency and independence. Translations of these various documents are all appended, marked B, C, D, E, F, G, and H.

* * * * * * *

Congress was to hold its first session at Malolos about September 20.

While this scheme of government is a pure despotism, yet it claims to be only temporary and intended to "prepare the country so that a true republic may be established." It also provides a rude form of governmental machinery for managing the affairs of the provinces. To what extent it has actually gone into operation it is difficult to say. Aguinaldo claims in his address of August 6 that it is in force in 15 provinces whose aggregate population is about 2,000,000. They include the island of Mindoro and about one-half of Luzon. None of these except Cavite have yet been visited by Americans, and all communication with them by the Spanish Government at Manila has been cut off since May 1.

In the province of Cavite and that portion of the province of Manila outside of the city and its suburbs which was occupied by the insurgent troops, as well as those of the United States, their military forces, military headquarters, etc., were very much in evidence, occupying the principal houses and churches in every village and hamlet; but there were no signs of civil government or administration. It was reported, however, that Aguinaldo's agents were levying taxes or forced contributions not only in the outside villages, but (after we entered Manila) by means of secret agents in the market places of the city itself. At Aguinaldo's headquarters, in Bacoor, there were signs of activity and business, and it was reported that his cabinet officers were in constant session there. Aguinaldo himself never failed to claim all the prerogatives due to his alleged position as the de facto ruler of the country.

The only general officer that saw him or had any direct communication with him was General Anderson. He did much to thwart this officer in organizing a native wagon train and otherwise providing for his troops, and he went so far in a letter of July 23 (copy herewith, marked "J") as to warn General Anderson not to land American troops on Philippine soil without his consent—a notice which it is hardly necessary to say was ignored. The day before the attack on Manila he sent staff officers to the same general asking for our plans of attack so that their troops could enter Manila with us. The same request had previously been made to me by one of his brigade commanders, to which I replied that I was not authorized to give the information desired.

Aguinaldo did not call upon General Merritt on his arrival, and this enabled the latter to avoid any communication with him, either direct or indirect, until after Manila had been taken. General Merritt then received one of Aguinaldo's staff officers in his office as military governor. The interview lasted more than an hour. General Merritt referred to his proclamation as showing the conditions under which the American troops had come to Manila and the nature of the military government which would be maintained until further orders from Washington. He agreed upon the lines outside of the city of Manila up to which the insurgent troops could come, but no farther, with arms in their hands; he asked for possession of the waterworks, which was given; and while expressing our friendship and sympathy for the Philippine people, he stated very positively that the United States Government had placed at his disposal an ample force for carrying out his instructions, and even if the services of Aguinaldo's forces had been needed as allies he should not have felt at liberty to accept them.

The problem of how to deal with Aguinaldo's government and troops will necessarily be accompanied with embarrassment and diffulty, and will require much tact and skill in its solution. The United States Government, through its naval commander, has to some extent made use of them for a distinct military purpose, viz, to harass and annoy the Spanish troops, to wear them out in the trenches, to blockade Manila on the land side, and to do as much damage as possible to the Spanish Government prior to the arrival of our troops; and for this purpose the admiral allowed them to take arms and munitions which he had captured at Cavite and their ships to pass in and out of Manila Bay in their expeditions against other provinces. But the admiral has been very careful to give Aguinaldo no assurances of recognition and no pledges or promises of any description. The services which Aguinaldo and his adherents rendered in preparing the way for attack on Manila are certainly entitled to consideration; but, after all, they were small in comparison with what was done by our own fleet and army.

[From testimony of Maj. Gen. Charles A. Whittier before Peace Commission at Paris.]

Examination by Mr. Day:

Q. Please state your name, the length of time you have been at Manila, and the opportunities you have had for observation there.

A. Charles A. Whittier, brigadier-general, United States Volunteers. I left San Francisco on June 28 last and went to Honolulu, which I left on July 8, and arrived at Manila on July 25. Remained in the harbor meeting the merchants, who came out to the ship as frequently as they could, until a prohibition was put on their frequent visits.

Officers constantly came aboard of our ship on the way to and from camp and reported the different stories about the conduct of the insurgents and the Spaniards, and of the small engagements occurring, different evenings. After communications addressed by Admiral Dewey and General Merritt to the acting captain-general, asking him to remove his noncombatants, and next demanding the surrender of the city, which requests were both denied the Belgian consul, as a semiintermediary, came repeatedly to Dewey and proposed different methods of giving up the city after we had made an attack, which, he said, was necessary to satisfy the Spanish honor. So the guns opened on August 13, and after the white flag was shown I was sent, in company with Lieutenant Brumby, on the launch of the Belgian consul to receive the surrender.

We landed by a stone pier running out into the water, which was rough and getting rougher, but we got ashore very comfortably at about noon, much better than those who went later in the afternoon. Two carriages awaited us, and an interpreter by the name of Carlos Casademunt, together with Colonel of the Staff Don Jose M. Olaguer and Captain of Artillery Don Francisco Chavairi, who also spoke English, conducted us to the house of the captain-general, where we found about 40 officers awaiting us. They had a number of pages of stipulations, to two of which I could not consent, being that their arms should be given to them and the army sent back to Spain, though I think now it would have been wise to do so.

Admiral Montojo, who had commanded their vessels in the fight, was there, and seemed to have his wits about him better than the rest. I think the captain-general was much frightened. He reported in great trepidation that the insurgents were coming into the city, and I said that I knew that that was impossible, because such precautions had been taken as rendered it so. The subject had been broached two days before and all the arrangements had been made. A little later they said that our people were on the front of the city, the corner of the walled city, and were firing there. I wrote a letter to the commander of the troops, who turned out to be General Greene, and asked that the firing should be suspended, which it was, and Brumby returned to Admiral Dewey.

Going through the city we passed perhaps 1,500 Spaniards, with rude, old-fashioned artillery, and the men looked very well, infinitely better than the Southerners did at the surrender of our other war. I wrote a note to General Merritt asking him to come to the city. They said that the town hall, their hotel de ville, or the ayuntamiento, was the best place for headquarters. We adjourned there, and I asked them to deposit their arms in the courtyard, to which they demurred, saying that it was not yet a formal surrender, but they did stack them, and I went down to meet Merritt, missed him, and when he arrived he found about 3,000 people there with arms. About 9 o'clock a memorandum was made of the surrender, and the next day General Greene, Captain Lamberton of the Navy, Colonel Crowder, and myself were on the commission for the terms of surrender.

After that I made it a point to know all the merchants in the town. I knew all the English, the principal traders there. The only Americans in the place were Mr. Daland, a custom-house broker, and a Mr. Russell, whose father was an American; he is now connected with one of the leading firms. I went over the line of the only railroad in the Philippines, leaving on Saturday morning and going up 120 miles through the rice fields, a country of marvelous and most extraordinary fertility.

The next morning we started out early and went up to Dagupan Bay, the terminus of the road, that little niche on the left [indicated on the map]. We found about 300 insurgents in the cars, who were going down to some points on the line. They said they had been up at Vigan, where the Spaniards had a custom-house, and had been driven out. This station was all battered to pieces by the Spaniards in some previous engagement.

Mr. Gray:

Q. What sort of looking people are the insurgents?

A. They are somewhat undersized, are fairly good in appearance, are brave, will stand any amount of hunger and hardship, and, well led, would be very good soldiers.

* * * * * * *

Aguinaldo went to Cavite, under the permission of Admiral Dewey, in reply to a telegram sent by Spencer Pratt, esq., our consul-general at Singapore, who offered that chief money for his expenses. The offer was declined. After arrival (on one of our ships) he went ashore, accompanied by 13 staff officers, to organize his army; but no adherents appeared the first day, and Aguinaldo, rather discouraged, meditated returning to Hongkong.

I think Dewey advised him to make another effort, at the same time saying that he must leave the public buildings at Cavite, where he had made his headquarters. Soon, from across the bay and from all sides, men gathered. The fact that Dewey permitted the armed men to move from the surrounding districts and for the rebels to take arms (not many, says the Admiral) in the arsenal was the only help we gave him, excepting, of course, the most important destruction of the Spanish navy. From that time the military operations and the conduct of the insurgents have been most creditable. Positions taken and the movements of troops show great ability on the part of some leader—I do not say it was necessarily Aguinaldo, but he gave the directions.

The Chairman:

Q. How many men did he get together?

A. His forces went around the city, taking the waterworks and the north part of the city and running up the railroad. I asked that question of several, and the opinions differed widely—all the way from 8,000 to 30,000 or 40,000 men.

Q. Do you think he had as many as 8,000 men before the surrender?

A. Yes, sir; the environment of the city took a great many men. There is a vast extent of country there, including the waterworks and running around the city, and they certainly had to have more than that to do so.

Q. How many arms did Dewey turn over to them?

A. I never knew exactly. I asked him that question, and he said a very few.

Q. Where did they get the rest of their arms?

A. Some captured from the Spanish, some brought to him by deserters, and there were some shipments of arms from Hongkong—I believe Americans brought them in—and they have lately taken some to Batangas, in the southern part, and have taken some new Maxim guns in there, too.

Mr. Gray:

Q. To the insurgents?

A. Yes.

Q. Since the capitulation?

A. Yes; they changed the name of a vessel and used it. She had had a Luzon name, the Pasig, and they changed it to the Abby. Dewey sent down and seized the boat, and the insurgents followed to Manila Bay, hoping to reclaim it. In other respects their demands, from their point of view, have not been unreasonable, and show a proper appreciation of the status.

STATEMENT RESUMED.

The day after the surrender (August 13) four representatives of Aguinaldo called on General Merritt, who assured them in general terms that "we are the friends of the Filipinos." At that time they occupied a portion of Manila. We soon demanded that they should give that up, to which Aguinaldo's representative agreed, but in seeking confirmation from him the condition was made that in case we gave up the country they should be restored to the positions then occupied and which they had taken greatly by their own merits. However, matters have been amicably settled. Aguinaldo's headquarters are at Malolos, 23 miles up the railroad. His troops control all the settled part of the island (except Manila), as well as much of the southern country.

The Chairman:

Q. What do you mean by the "southern country"—those islands below?

A. Yes.

Their conduct to their Spanish prisoners has been deserving of the praise of all the world. With hatred of priests and Spaniards, fairly held on account of the conditions before narrated, and with every justification to a savage mind for the most brutal revenge, I have heard no instance of torture, murder, or brutality since we have been in the country.

The Chairman:

Q. Did you ever talk with Admiral Dewey about his relations with Aguinaldo?

A. Yes, sir. He read me a copy of his dispatch in answer to the one in which he is asked the question whether he had made any promises, and he said he had not. Aguinaldo went down with his concurrence, without doubt, and the Admiral allowed armed people to cross the bay and join him and made no remonstrance.

Q. Did he furnish him any arms?

A. He says not, except the few furnished them from Cavite. Foreman, in his article, makes the statement that he has a treaty with Aguinaldo, and I went one morning and left the article with the Admiral to read, and he said it was not true.

Q. This relation—whatever Admiral Dewey did—took place before he got the dispatch of inquiry from the Navy Department—some time before?

A. Yes.

Q. How far does the Admiral say he encouraged Aguinaldo?

A. I do not think he says he gave him any encouragement, except that he rather dissuaded him from returning to Hongkong when he was discouraged.

Q. Did you get that statement from Dewey?

A. Yes. Aguinaldo was rather discouraged when any of the people failed to come to his banner on the first day. That dispatch also included a statement that he knew well the Filipinos and the Cubans, and that the Filipinos were a far superior people—I think that was in that dispatch; it was in one.

Mr. FRYE:

Q. Were they of material assistance to us?

A. Very great. If the protocol had not been signed I think the Spanish at home would have insisted upon their army doing something. They dismissed Augustin because he was not disposed to fight, and I think if they had not had this experience of having been driven back into the city and the water cut off, so even that Jaudenes said he could not remove his noncombatants, the Government would have insisted on his making a fight, and he could have made a very good one, for his position was strong, if they had any fight in them at all. But every place had been taken from them by the Filipinos, who managed their advances and occupation of the country in an able manner.

The Chairman:

Q. The insurrection had been ended in December, 1897, by an arrangement under which money was paid in Hongkong and certain reforms promised. Were these promises ever carried out?

A. Not at all, and Primo de Rivera stated lately in the Cortes that he never made any. I was surprised at reading that statement.

STATEMENT RESUMED.

I talked with Spanish prisoners at Tarlac, an important military station on the line of the railroad, and they said that they had had good treatment only. The wives of two officers had lately visited their husbands in jail (one at Dagupan, 123 miles north) and gave same testimony.

Aguinaldo, in a letter of August 1 to our late consul at Manila, Mr. Williams, said: "Say to the Government at Washington that the Filipino people abominate savagery; that in the midst of their past misfortunes they have learned to love liberty, order, justice, and civil life." I believe the natives to be brave (under good leadership), most tolerant of fatigue and hunger, and amenable to command and discipline, if justice and fair dealing rule. They are very temperate, as most of the natives of the East are. I have never seen a drunken one, and this with the example of our soldiers, whom they imitate in everything else; very quiet, no loud quarrels, very good house servants and cooks.

[From testimony of Maj. Gen. Wesley Merritt before Peace Commission at Paris.]

General MERRITT. With reference to the last letter read, that letter and one other letter received from Aguinaldo, which has been mislaid and which I can not reproduce, I made no reply to, except to tell him he must withdraw his forces outside those limits.

The commission he refers to was brought to me by General Anderson. He asked me if I would talk to them, and I said I would. It was a few days after the surrender, and I received them at my headquarters in Manila, and they agreed the insurgents should withdraw outside any lines I might designate. I detailed two officers, General Greene and General MacArthur, to designate a line in red pencil, and gave it to them on a map, and told them I should insist on the withdrawal of his troops. It took in part of the lines Aguinaldo's troops had occupied previous to our getting there, but it was necessary to enforce a proper status between the insurgents and our own forces and to keep them out of Manila.

Before that time, rather early after my arrival there at Manila, I had telegraphed to the War Department of the possible trouble that might arise with the insurgents, and asked for instructions as to whether I should consider them as enemies and treat them accordingly in such case. To that request I had no reply, and the consequence was I had to mix diplomacy with force in order to avoid a tilt with them. I knew, if bloodshed was once had, that would be the end of an amicable status there, and to that end I was careful only to enforce that which was proper and which I conceived must be executed in order to have my troops fully occupy the ground we had taken. In his letters to General Anderson he speaks of concessions they made there in the occupation of lines. They did.

I told General Greene—gave him the instructions—to try to get these positions by an amicable arrangement if possible, but, if necessary, to report the fact to me, and I should use force to secure them. At the time I went there I found we had no lines, no base upon which to approach Manila. The insurgents had their pickets to the front of ours, and our main guard was in the rear of their main guard, and I gave General Greene orders to change that status, which he did, and purely by arrangement with that general of whom Major Bell speaks as being a very sensible fellow and a good fellow. It appears, when the request was made of him, he corresponded with Aguinaldo, and the latter agreed to it.

CAMP DEWEY, near Manila, 8—10—'98.

Gen. EMILIO AGUINALDO,
Commanding Filipino Forces, Bacoor:

Will your excellency consent to my occupation of the intrenchment facing Blockhouse No. 14, on the road from Pasay to Cingalon? Our object is to place artillery to destroy the blockhouse. If you consent, please issue necessary orders to-night. I shall highly appreciate a prompt reply.

THOMAS M. ANDERSON,
Brigadier-General, Commanding Division.

[Telegram.]

BACOOR, August 10, 1898.

Brig. Gen. THOMAS M. ANDERSON, U. S. V.,
Camp Dewey.

SIR: Replying to your note of this date, in which you ask me the occupation by your troops of the intrenchments facing Blockhouse No. 14 only, on the road from Pasay to Cingalon, I have the pleasure to tell you that I [am] giving the necessary orders so that your troops may occupy the mentioned intrenchments, and my troops will pass to the immediate intrenchments or to any other place where they think convenient to intrench themselves.

I remain, most respectfully, yours,

E. AGUINALDO.

[Telegram.]

MANILA, P. I., August 13, 1898.

General AGUINALDO,
General in Chief, Filipino Forces:

Serious trouble threatening between our forces. Try and prevent it. Your forces should not force themselves in the city until we have received the full surrender. Then we will negotiate with you.

ANDERSON.

[Most urgent—Pineda received from Bacoor 10.50 a. m., 13th.]

General Aguinaldo, Ermita, president of revolutionary government, to General Anderson, Ermita.

I received a telegram. My interpreter is in Cavite. In consequence of this I have not answered until now. My troops are forced by yours, by means of threats of violence, to retire from positions taken. It is necessary to avoid conflict, which I should lament, that you order your troops that they avoid difficulty with mine, as until now they have conducted themselves as brothers to take Manila. I have given strict orders to my chiefs that they preserve strict respect to American forces and to aid them in case they are attacked by a common enemy.

I do not doubt that the good relations and friendship which unite us will be continued if your soldiers correspond to the conduct imposed upon mine.

E. AGUINALDO.

[Memoranda, without date, in General Anderson's handwriting.]

If you apparently have been treated harshly, it is from military necessity and not for want of confidence. We had to take Manila to effect the purpose of our war.

While we may admit the justice of your insurrection, to prevent all possible complications, still it is thought judicious and necessary to have only one army in Manila at once.

[In General Merritt's handwriting.]

The Government of the United States, you may be assured, which as its agent I can make no promises, will deal fairly with the Filipinos, but we must now insist, for the good of all, there shall be no joint occupation of Manila.

NOTE.—This is apparently the draft of a telegram sent in reply to General Aguinaldo's message, dated 10.50 a. m., August 13, and marked "Most urgent."

THE BACKWOODS FILIPINO.

[By Leonard R. Sargent.]

It has been my privilege to have been intimately associated with the Filipino people for a short time at a most interesting period of their history. With the permission of Admiral Dewey, I spent the greater part of the months of October and November of 1898, in company with Paymaster W. B. Wilcox, United States Navy, in the interior of the northern part of the island of Luzon. It will be remembered that at that date the United States had not yet announced its policy with regard to the Philippines. The terms of the treaty with Spain were being negotiated by our commissioners at Paris, and the fate of the islands hung in the balance. In the meantime the native population, taking matters into their own hands, had declared their independence from all foreign jurisdiction and had set up a provisional government, with Aguinaldo at its head.

Although this government has never been recognized, and in all probability will go out of existence without recognition, yet it can not be denied that, in a region occupied by many millions of inhabitants, for nearly six months it stood alone between anarchy and order. The military forces of the United States held control anly in Manila, with its environs, and in Cavite, and had no authority to proceed further; while in the vast remaining districts the representatives of the only other recognized power on the field were prisoners in the hands of their despised subjects. It was the opinion at Manila during this anomalous period in our Philippine relations, and possibly in the United States as well, that such a state of affairs must breed something akin to anarchy.

I can state unreservedly, however, that Mr. Wilcox and I found the existing conditions to be much at variance with this opinion. During our absence from Manila we traveled more than 600 miles in a very comprehensive circuit through the northern part of the island of Luzon, traversing a characteristic and important district. In this way we visited seven provinces, of which some were under the immediate control of the central government at Malolos, while others were remotely situated, separated from each other and from the seat of government by natural divisions of land, and accessible only by lengthy and arduous travel. As a tribute to the efficiency of Aguinaldo's government and to the law-abiding character of his subjects, I offer the fact that Mr. Wilcox and I pursued our journey throughout in perfect security, and returned to Manila with only the most pleasing recollections of the quiet and orderly life which we found the natives to be leading under the new régime.

* * * * * * *

Our entertainment in the different towns varied according to the facilities at hand; but in all cases music was a leading feature. In the absence of all accessories the village band would be called into the building in which we were received and would play tune after tune well on into the night, while we conversed at our ease with the village fathers. At the little village of Cordon, which has a population of only a few hundred, we passed one of the pleasantest evenings of our journey. In this instance four accomplished little girls gave the entertainment its particular charm. Soon after our arrival the entire village trooped into the large room of the public building that had been turned over to our party. The floor was cleared for a dance, and the band commenced with a waltz. After the waltz was finished two of the little girls danced a minuet and sang a very pretty dialogue accompaniment. The movement of the minuet was very slow and stately, and the little dancers went through it with charming effect.

* * * * * * *

We spent three days at Ilagan, and I think that it was here that we were brought into closest touch with the Filipino character. The cultured class, which I have spoken of before, was strongly in evidence, and I think that before leaving we had discussed views with nearly every member of it. They all realized that they were passing through a crucial period in the history of their people, and young and old were eager to acquire all possible knowledge that might assist them to think clearly at this crisis. Their realization of the gravity of their position did not, however, rob their character of its natural gayety, nor make them forget their duty as hosts. On the evening following our arrival a ball was given in our honor, which was attended by all the élite of the town.

There were present about 50 young women and twice that number of men. All were dressed in European fashion. The girls were pleasant and intelligent; the men comported themselves in all respects like gentlemen. It was hard to realize that we were in the very heart of a country generally supposed to be given up to semisavages. At intervals between dances many songs were sung, usually by one or two of the guests, while all frequently joined in the chorus. The national hymn was repeated several times with great enthusiasm. The ball lasted until nearly 3 o'clock in the morning, and broke up with good feeling at its height.

On the second evening we were invited to attend the theater, where two one-act Spanish plays were presented by the young society people of the town. The theater itself had been constructed by the villagers only a few weeks before. It was a large bamboo structure, one end of which was used as the village market, while the stage occupied the other end. The stage arrangements were good; curtain, side scenes, and footlights all en règle. In the performance of the play we saw our friends—these typical young Filipinos—in a light in which very few of our nation have had an opportunity to view them. They comported themselves with credit in a position where humor, intelligence, and artistic ability were the requisites of success.

* * * * * * *

There was one form of hospitality which we met both at Ilagan and at Caparri that we would gladly have avoided. I still shudder when I recall the stupendous dinners that were spread before us night after night. The Filipinos pride themselves on their cookery, and it is indeed excellent. There could be no cause for complaint on that score. There is never any suspicion of the greasy and garlicky flavor to the food that characterizes a Spanish meal. Our host at Ilagan employed three cooks, each of whom in turn officiated at the preparation of one of the three dinners which we ate in that town. It is impossible to say which one deserved the palm. The shortest of the three dinners numbered fifteen courses and seemed interminable. In addition to fish, rice, chickens, and other domestic products of the country, there were served game of many sorts, including doves, snipes, deer, mountain buffalo, and boar. It was astonishing how many of the dishes were "coniida del pais," and must be sampled by the visitors to secure a just conception of the Filipino talent in matters of the palate. We felt on leaving the table as if the horn of plenty had been thrust against our lips and its contents to the last crumb forced down our unwilling throats.

* * * * * * *

We no longer passed from town to town through unsettled stretches of country. The fields on both sides of the road were under cultivation and were dotted with laborers, while on the road itself there were always many travelers. The laborers in the fields worked in the shade of large screens of nipa leaves, which they carried with them from place to place.

* * * * * * *

At a town in Isabella my attention was drawn to a number of young girls returning from their first communion. They were clothed in dresses of pure white, and long veils hung chastely down below their shoulders.

I drank in the details of the picture with delight until I came to the thick haze that overhung it. Through the meshes of each veil a tube of tobacco was thrust, and every pair of dainty lips gave its continual contribution to the cloud of smoke that dwelt around the little group like a halo of universal sanction.

* * * * * * *

Out of respect to the statements of other people which the narrative of my experience may seem to contradict, I wish to say that I have found the native of the interior of Luzon an astonishingly different character from the one ordinarily met in Manila. Previous to my journey I regarded those whom I had encountered in that city with great dislike, and after my return I was unable to overcome that feeling. They are not a fair sample of the race, and I can not expect anyone who has formed his judgment on the subject merely from observations of that type to express an opinion similar to mine as recorded above.

THE MILITARY FILIPINO.

[From The Outlook, September 23, 1899.]

[By Leonard R. Sargent.]

The provisional government which assumed control of Filipino affairs at Luzon Island after the downfall of the Spanish power was a military one. The president of the so-called republic was general of the army and had at his command all the forces of the state, while military officers filled the high positions throughout the provinces. It was continually asserted by those in power that this disposition of the control of affairs had been resorted to merely to tide over the existing emergency, and that it should continue only until the establishment of a permanent peace.

As long as it remained in force, however, the concentration of power was absolute, and, moreover, no change of government could be contemplated without the cooperation of the controlling class. In the event of peace the population hoped to see the reins of government placed in their hands, but if opposition were offered, they certainly had not the power to seize them. The military class controlled the situation, and with it, in great measure, the destiny of the people. Accordingly as they were actuated by motives of patriotism or of personal ambition they could, if unmolested, inaugurate a just and liberal government or they could set upon the galled shoulders of their race a yoke as cruel as that they had just cast off.

It will never be known how they would have stood this crucial test. The peace they had anticipated is further from them now than ever, and it has been decreed that a stronger power should relieve them of the responsibility of the vital decision. Yet they have not been deprived of importance. They still retain the official voice of their people, and it is with them that our nation is now at war. In view of their present preeminent in Luzon affairs, past, present, and future, some interest must attach to every observation of their character, especially to such as tend to show to what extent they represent the feelings and aspirations of the great mass of the Filipino population, and in what measure they have at heart the truest interests of their race.

The leaders of the military element have been drawn, almost without exception, from the younger generation of that enlightened class of Filipinos of which I have spoken in a previous article as existing everywhere throughout Luzon Island. They possess, of course, many qualities in common with their older kinsfolk, in whose charge they have been reared; and yet they differ from them so significantly on many points as to deserve particular attention. The characters of men are not set to such rigid lines as to remain unchanged by the sudden attainment of authority, and the Filipino, like his brother of every other land, assumes a new demeanor with his uniform of office.

Throughout the period of my association with both classes I found the distinction apparent between civilians and military officers. Had Mr. Wilcox and I been provided for our journey with the customary credentials required of travelers in that country, many of the evidences of this difference which came to our notice would have been missing. Starting without passports, however (in fact, after having been refused them by Aguinaldo), our status was such as to invite all possible arrogance on the part of the officials, while throwing the most favorable light upon the open hospitality of the citizens.

Under the circumstances, I am inclined to think that there was a surprising lack of arrogance in the attitude which the officials assumed toward us. Yet there was a dignity in their bearing, and in some cases a coldness, caused by their suspicions of the motive of our journey, which were entirely lacking in their civilian countrymen. "Armor is heavy, but it is a proud burden, and a man standeth straight in it." So these young Filipinos, vested with the authority of their office and supporting the responsibility of their duty toward the state, assumed a manlier and more independent bearing than the genial and conciliatory one of the older men.

In the opposition which they frequently offered to our plans we found much that was inconvenient, but nothing that was unreasonable from their point of view. We found them hard to cajole, or to "bluff," or to move by any means other than a fair and open statement which they could clearly understand. Before the end of the journey we came to regard the military Filipino as the only stumbling block to our progress. And yet, in spite of the annoyance he caused us and of the frequent changes in our itinerary induced by his persistent opposition, we learned to admire him far beyond his simpler and more amiable countrymen.

* * * * * * *

At the time of our journey the patriotic enthusiasm of the population was everywhere at its height. The boast of every inhabitant was the national army whose organization was then being rapidly perfected. Commissions were eagerly sought by the young men of the higher class, and there were more volunteers for service in the ranks than could be armed or uniformed.

It was universally asserted that every preparation should be made to defend the newly won independence of the island against all foreign aggression. The older Filipinos, especially those of wealth and influence, declared their desire to give every support in their power to the cause, and were as much a part of the warlike movement as those who actually took up arms. The great majority of the latter, both officers and enlisted men, were extremely young. I have met a brigadier-general of 21 years of age, many captains of 18, and lieutenants of 15 and 16. Captain Natioidad, a particularly young officer of that rank and a member of a prominent Luzon family, explained that it was the aim of his government to rest its defense in the field in the hands of those of its supporters who were at that age that is most forcibly swayed by the love of military glory. For the desperate encounters that might await its army in the future it desired that sort of valor of which discretion is not the better part.

That the civil power should be placed in the same hands was a dangerous experiment, but at the same time a necessary one. The first object of the Filipinos had been to win their independence; the next was to defend it. For both these purposes they had need of their best fighting material, and the selection was made accordingly. The result proved more fortunate than there had been any reason to hope. While exercising absolute authority throughout the island and governing entirely by military law, the leaders of the army appeared, nevertheless, to endeavor to mete out justice to all classes alike. They continued, moreover, to assert their intention to relinquish their temporary power when the establishment of a permanent peace should make such a step possible, and gave most encouraging proof of the good faith with which they spoke.

At Aparri we saw proof also of the extent of Aguinaldo's authority. Four natives had been tried for robbery and attempted murder and had been sentenced to death. At the time of our visit they were awaiting the arrival from Malolos of the ratification of their sentence by the president.

Everywhere we traveled the greatest loyalty toward Aguinaldo was expressed. Now, at the time of his reverses, it is possible, though I am far from convinced, that he represents but one element of his people; then, in his prosperity, he certainly represented them all—at least in northern Luzon.

At that time the enthusiasm of the people was tuned to the highest pitch. In every village every man was training in arms. Companies were formed of boys from 8 years of age upward. Wooden guns were furnished them and they were drilled systematically every day. The women also were imbued with the spirit. Many and many a time have the people of a village gathered in the large room of the "presidencia," where the paymaster and I were quartered, and put their whole hearts into the songs in which their patriotism found vent. Of these songs the national hymn was the favorite, and no one within hearing ever failed to join in the chorus:

Del sueño de tres siglos
Hermanos despertad!
Gritando, "Fuera España!
Viva la libertad!"

(From your sleep of three centuries,
Brothers, awake!
Crying, "Away with Spain!
Live liberty!")

After a delay of three days we were fortunate enough to catch a small coasting steamer, which took us around the northern end of the island and landed us on the western coast, at the northern end of the province of South Ilocos. From here we proceeded toward Manila. We wished to visit the interior provinces on this side of the island, but were prevented by the authorities. Already the hope was fading that freedom from Spain meant freedom of government. The feeling toward Americans was changing, and we saw its effect in the colder manner of the people and in their evident desire to hustle us along by the most direct road to Manila.

Although the spirit was evidently missing, we were nominally treated with every distinction. A mounted escort was furnished us, which rode ahead with guidons to clear the road.

REPORT OF TOUR THROUGH ISLAND OF LUZON.

MANILA, P. I., November 23, 1898.

SIR: 1. In obedience to your order, we herewith submit a report of the tour of observation of the northern part of the island of Luzon, undertaken by your authority during a leave of absence beginning October 5, 1898.

* * * * * * *

11. In the villages of Humingan and Lupao there are a few Spanish prisoners—priests, soldiers, and civil officials. We have seen representatives of each of these three classes in these towns. We could detect no signs of previous ill treatment nor of undue restriction. On the contrary, they appeared to possess the freedom of the town in which they lived.

12. The towns in this section are neither large nor important. Humingan, the largest, has not over two or three thousand inhabitants. The church, with the convent attached, is the largest building in each town; it is built of planed wood, whitewashed. There are three or four houses of planed wood in each town, the rest of the village consisting of grass huts. The presidente local and other local officers are native Filipinos. Most of them have received a certain amount of education at religious schools in Manila. They are intelligent men and are extremely eager to learn news from the outside world. Their knowledge of modern history and geography, however, is extremely limited, and their ignorance of current events is surprising. We brought them their first definite information with regard to Cuba and to their own present status.

One or two of them had heard of the congress at Paris, but no one had any idea as to its object, nor as to its relation to themselves. They were well grounded on only three points—the destruction of the Spanish squadron in Manila Harbor, the surrender of Manila, and the declaration by the Philippine government at Malolos of the independence of the islands and the establishment of a republican form of government, with Señor Aguinaldo as president. Even on these points the details they had received were very inaccurate. Between the towns of Rosales and Humingan there are two small villages, called barrios, varying in population from 1,000 to 3,000 inhabitants. We were thus enabled to sleep in a hut overnight, and avoid camping in the wet fields by the roadside. These barrios are under the jurisdiction of the nearest town or "pueblo."

There were soldiers in each town, but not more than 20 in any place, and there was no commissioned officer in the district. We were cordially received everywhere, not only by the heads of the town, but also by the laboring and farming people, who always saluted us in a friendly manner when we passed. On leaving each town our interpreter was presented by the presidente local with passes. These passes always included our native servants and packmen and sometimes ourselves as well. They were good only to the next town, and secured a comparatively prompt exchange of packmen. We were never allowed to take any men farther than to the next town without permanently attaching them to our party. It is the duty of the presidente local of each town to do his share in facilitating the journey of every properly accredited traveler. Usually the assistance brings him in a pecuniary return. The duty then becomes a privilege, and is very zealously guarded.

* * * * * * *

41. At Aparri we went alongside the Philippina and reached the wharf by crossing this vessel. We were met on board by Commandante Leyba, military commander in the province of Cagayan. We were taken to a private house, where we were quartered during our stay at Aparri. Here we met Colonel Tirona, commander of the military district, including the provinces of Neuva Vizcaya, Isabella, and Cagayan. He welcomed us cordially and continued from that time to treat us in a very friendly manner. We remained at Aparri three days, until the departure of the steamer Oslo, November 9.

42. The steamer Saturnas, which had left the harbor the day before our arrival, brought news from Hongkong papers that the Senators from the United States at the congress at Paris favored the independence of the islands with an American protectorate. Colonel Tirona considered the information of sufficient reliability to justify him in regarding the Philippine independence as assured and warfare in the island at an end. For this reason he proceeded to relinquish the military command he held over the provinces and to place this power in the hands of a civil officer elected by the people. On the day following our arrival in Aparri the ceremony occurred which solemnized this transfer of authority in the province of Cagayan.

The presidentes locales of all the towns in the province were present at the ceremony, conducted by a native priest. After the priest had retired Colonel Tirona made a short speech, stating that, since in all probability permanent peace was at hand, it became his duty to relinquish the authority he had previously held over the province, and to place it in the hands of a civil officer elected by the people. He then handed the staff of office to the man who had been elected "jefe-provincial." This officer also made a speech, in which he thanked the disciplined military forces and their colonel for the service they had rendered the province, and assured them that the work they had begun would be perpetuated by the people of the province, where every man, woman, and child stood ready to take up arms to defend their newly won liberty, and to resist with the last drop of their blood the attempt of any nation whatever to bring them back to their former state of dependence.

His speech was very impassioned. He then knelt, placed his hand on an open Bible, and took the oath of office. He was followed by the three other officers who constitute the provincial government, the heads of the three departments—justice, police, and internal revenue. Every town in this province has this same organization. At the time of our departure Colonel Tirona planned to go within a few days to Ilagan and from there to Bayombong, repeating this ceremony in the capital city of each province.

* * * * * * *

INTELLIGENCE AND EDUCATION OF THE NATIVES.

53. The Philippine officers, both military and civil, that we have met in all the provinces we have visited, have, with very few exceptions, been men of intelligent appearance and conversation. The same is true of all those men who form the upper class in each town. The education of most of them is limited, but they appear to seize every opportunity to improve it. They have great respect and admiration for learning. Very many of them desire to send their children to schools in the United States or Europe. Many men of importance in different towns have told us that the first use to be made of the revenues of their government, after there is no more danger of war, will be to start good schools in every village. The poorer classes are extremely ignorant on most subjects, but a large percentage of them can read and write.

* * * * * * *

POPULAR SENTIMENT REGARDING INDEPENDENCE.

57. Of the large number of officers, civil and military, and of leading townspeople we have met, nearly every man has expressed in our presence his sentiment on this question. It is universally the same. They all declare they will accept nothing short of independence. They desire the protection of the United States at sea, but fear any interference on land. The question of the remuneration of our Government for the expense of establishing a protectorate is never touched upon. On the subject of independence there is, again, a marked difference between the four provinces first visited and those of Ilocos Sur and Union. In the former there is more enthusiasm—the sentiment is more of the people; in the latter it is more of the higher class and of the army. In these provinces we have seen signs of actual discontent with the existing state of things.

ATTITUDE TOWARD THE UNITED STATES.

58. There is much variety of feeling among the Philippines with regard to the debt of gratitude they owe to the United States. In every town we found men said that our nation had saved them from slavery, and others who claimed that without our interference their independence would have been recognized before this time. On one point they are united, however, viz, that whatever our Government may have done for them, it has not gained the right to annex them.

* * * * * * *

With regard to the total force of the Philippine army, actual and reserve, we can not speak from our own knowledge.

Colonel Tirona claimed that 200,000 men from all the islands could be put in the field well armed; and several other officers have independently given the same figure. Every officer that we have seen carried a Spanish sword and revolver. They wear these weapons constantly, but regard them with contempt, preferring the bola at close quarters. The Philippina, which was at Aparri during our visit, carries two guns of a caliber of about 3 inches. These are the only guns we have seen, with the exception of two revolving cannons in the palacio at Malolos. We saw no fortifications. The Spaniards have left numerous stockades in the wilder regions, and the natives have built a few others.

There are also numerous barricades, thrown up during the insurrection. In the towns the Spaniards defended themselves in the houses for want of other protection. The military spirit pervades the eastern district, where every town and barrio has organized companies of its children, which are drilled every day. In the western districts we did not see any children under arms. The officers have had no military education except that which they gained during the insurrection. Spanish drill tactics are used, and most of the officers are still studying the elementary text-book.

Respectfully submitted.

Paymaster, U. S. N.
LEONARD R. SARGENT,
Naval Cadet, U. S. N.

FLAGSHIP OLYMPIA,
Cavite, P. I., December 1, 1898.

Approved and respectfully forwarded for the information of the Navy Department.

Especial attention is invited to this interesting and carefully prepared report, which, in my opinion, contains the most complete and reliable information obtainable in regard to the present state of the northern part of Luzon Island.

GEORGE DEWEY,
Rear-Admiral, U. S. N., Commanding Asiatic Station.

Correspondence before Iloilo, in the island of Panay.

HEADQUARTERS SEPARATE BRIGADE,
Iloilo Harbor, P. I., December 30, 1898.

COMMANDING GENERAL,
Department of the Pacific, Manila, P. I.

SIR: I have just concluded second conference with commission representing the native government at Iloilo. They submitted a communication, copy inclosed herewith.

This communication was supplemented by verbal statements that if we insisted on landing our troops, but without arms and as friends, they could not answer for the attitude of the people, but that the army would endeavor to restrain the people. If we landed in force they would not answer for the attitude of either army or people. This means, plainly, armed resistance to our landing.

A large number of native troops have been brought to the city within the past thirty-six hours. Best estimate 12,000, 2,500 of which are armed with rifles, the remainder being armed with bolos only. Their ammunition supply reported limited.

The situation is further complicated by petition of Iloilo merchants, representing the larger part of mercantile interests there, copy of which find herewith.

I understand, General, that it was at the request of many of the parties signing this petition for protection of life and property at Iloilo that this expedition was organized and dispatched to this point; that their request was largely its justification.

Their present attitude contradicts their previous petition in a measure, and as the situation, if forced by me, by a landing of United States troops, promises great loss of life among noncombatants and destruction of private property at Iloilo I have deemed it best to delay compliance with my orders for a sufficient time to communicate the above information to you and receive your instructions. I am further influenced to this delay because of the fact that before making the formidable attack upon Iloilo now necessary it would be incumbent upon me to give the usual notice looking to the removal of noncombatants to points of safety.

I entertain no doubt of my ability to take and hold Iloilo with my present force, but in view of excitement prevailing among inhabitants of the city and island, as reported to me, and the large number of people assembled in the city, it might be prudent to send an additional regiment to this point.

Two steam launches suitable for towing rowboats for use in landing troops are much needed.

Very respectfully,

M. P. MILLER,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

[Translation of the letter from President Lopez, of the federal government of Bisayas, to General Miller.]

GENERAL: Upon the return of your commissioners last night we determined and discussed in a definite manner the situation and the attitude of this reason of Bisayas, in regard to its relations and dependence upon the central government of Luzon, and in view of what these commissioners have manifested, I have the honor to notify you that, in conjunction with the people, the army, and committee, we insist upon our pretension not to consent, in our present situation, to any foreign interference without express orders from the central government of Luzon, upon which we state once more that we depend, and with which we are one in ideas, as we have been until now in sacrifices.

Therefore, if you insist on your side upon disembarking your forces, this is our final attitde.

May God give you, etc.

Iloilo, December 30, 1898.

R. LOPEZ, President.
——— ———, Vice-Secretary.

To General MILLER.

To which General Miller replied on same date, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST SEPARATE BRIGADE,
EIGHTH ARMY CORPS,
ON BOARD TRANSPORT NEWPORT,
Iloilo Harbor, P. I., December 30, 1898.

Mr. ROQUE LOPEZ,
President Estado Federal de Bisayas, Iloilo.

SIR: I have the honor to express my regret that your committee has concluded to offer armed resistance to the occupancy of Iloilo by the United States forces at this time. I shall wait for the present in a spirit of friendship, hoping that your opinions may change after reconsideration. I will give you timely notice of my intentions.

Very respectfully,

M. P. MILLER,
Brigadier-General, U. S. V., Commanding.

On the 31st of December the president, R. Lopez, wrote a second letter couched in the following language:

General MILLER.

GENERAL: I heartily concur in your wishes, which is also ours, to arrange matters in a spirit of good friendship; but not having the power to surrender the city and the port of Iloilo, which having been taken by our forces in the name of the Filipino republic, whose central government resides in Malolos, I regret finding myself in the position of persisting in not consenting to the landing of your forces without the direct orders of the central government.

I trust that you will see the justice of our claim compacted by the will of the people explicitly declared last night at the great meeting called for the purpose.

May God give you, etc.

The president,

R. LOPEZ.

PRESIDENT'S HOUSE IN THE CITY OF JARO,
December 31, 1898.

On January 1 General Miller transmitted to Señor Lopez the instructions of His Excellency the President of the United States of December 28, relative to the administration of affairs in the Philippine Islands. In transmitting this proclamation General Miller wrote as follows:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST SEPARATE BRIGADE,
EIGHTH ARMY CORPS,
ON BOARD TRANSPORT NEWPORT,
Iloilo Harbor, January 1, 1898.

Mr. ROQUE LOPEZ, President.

SIR: The within cablegram from the President of the United States to the United States military governor in the Philippines, transmitted by the latter to me yesterday, is inclosed herewith for the information of your committee and of the people of Iloilo and Panay Island. Its more important statements are:

I. That the destruction of the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay and the surrender of the Spanish army of occupation to forces of the United States, followed by the signing of the treaty of peace at Paris on the 10th instant, operate to give the future control, disposition, and government of the Philippine Islands to the United States.

II. It authorizes and directs the military commander in the Philippines to extend, with all possible dispatch, the military government heretofore maintained in the city, harbor, and bay of Manila to the whole of the Philippine group.

III. It directs that the military government to be established among you shall be exerted for the security of persons and property of the people of the island and for the conformation of their private rights and relations. It announces to you that the army does not come among you as invaders and conquerors, but as friends to establish and maintain a government which will accord to the people what is the heritage of all free peoples—the full measure of individual rights and liberty.

The forces here under my command have been sent to this point for the purpose of executing the above orders. Although fully conscious of my power to occupy the city at any moment, I have, nevertheless, waited, that you might have ample time to fully deliberate upon the questions presented. As indicated in the President's cablegram under existing conditions, the people of Panay Island owe obedience to the political authority of the United States, and grave responsibilities will be incurred if, after deliberation, it is decided to resist that authority. In obedience to my instructions, and in the belief that the highest interests of the people will be served by immediate occupation by the troops under my command and the establishment of the authority of the United States, I again express the desire that the native troops be withdrawn, thus assuring the entry of the forces under my command without unusual incident or menace to life and property interests in Iloilo.

I am, very respectfully,

M. P. MILLER,
Brigadier-General, U. S. Volunteers, Commanding.

On January 9 General Miller received the following letter from Señor R. Lopez in reply to his of January 1:

General MILLER.

GENERAL: We have the high honor of having received your message, dated January 1, of this year, inclosing letter of President McKinley. We have deliberated about these points, and as a result of our deliberation we deduce an answer to one of its clauses. We are not able to enter into discussion respecting the others, because it is not in the power of this council of state.

You say in one clause of your message: "As indicated in the President's cablegram, under these conditions the inhabitants of the island of Panay ought to obey the political authority of the United States, and they will incur a grave responsibility if, after deliberating, they decide to resist said authority."

So the council of state of this region of Visayas are, at this present moment, between the authority of the United States, that you try to impose on us, and the authority of the central revolutionary government at Malolos. The supposed authority of the United States began with the treaty at Paris on the 10th of December, 1898. The authority of the central government of Malolos is founded in the sacred and natural bonds of blood, language, uses, customs, ideas, sacrifices, etc. It is also founded principally on our political constitution, which began with the insurrection, and has been manifested in all its doings, so that the authority of the government of Malolos over us began at a date long before the treaty of Paris.

Now, after consideration, please tell us with sincerity, General, what authority we should obey, whether the authority of the United States, which began with the treaty of Paris on the 10th of December, 1898, of which we do not know officially, because the revolutionary government of Malolos has not been notified, which government is based on previous conquest, anterior to the said treaty, and the natural bonds created by politics and the constitution established since the first moment of the rebellion, on the 11th of August, 1896.

After all has been said we insist in not giving our consent to the disembarkation of your troops without an express order from our central government of Malolos.

The president,

R. LOPEZ.

JARO, January 9, 1899.

On January 11 General Miller replied to the letter of Señor R. Lopez of the 9th, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST SEPARATE BRIGADE,
EIGHTH ARMY CORPS,
ON BOARD TRANSPORT NEWPORT,
Iloilo Harbor, P. I., January 11, 1899.

Mr. R. LOPEZ, President Federal State of Bisayas.

SIR: I have the honor and pleasure to acknowledge receipt of your communication of January 9, and regret very much your final conclusion does not conform to the order of the President of the United States, which announces sovereignty over all these islands. You must rest assured in the end that the sovereignty will be maintained, whatever obstructions may temporarily intervene.

The President is very desirous for the people of the Philippine Islands to accept the authority of the United States as friends and without compulsion. You asked me in your letter to tell you, in sincerity, why your people should ackowledge authority of the United States now, rather than the authority of your central government. The President's order tells why you should acknowledge the authority of the United States; that is because of the treaty of Paris, December 10, 1898. The United States, in naval and land battles in Cuba, Porto Rico, and Manila, compelled Spain to relinquish authority over the Philippine Islands to the United States.

To this end she expended millions of dollars and thousands of lives, causing first the adoption of the protocol and finally the treaty. Every nation in the world recognizes the treaty as giving to the United States the same rights in the Philippine Islands as Spain formerly possessed. These rights of our Government were duly considered at Washington prior to the President issuing his order, and, no doubt, on the best legal advice in accordance with international law. I might say that the confederation of which you claim to be a part is not now acknowledged by any nation, and its existence is only accidental as a result of the war between Spain and the United States.

Very respectfully,

M. P. MILLER,
Brigadier-General, U. S. V., Commanding.

Also as follows:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST SEPARATE BRIGADE,
EIGHTH ARMY CORPS,
ON BOARD TRANSPORT NEWPORT,
Iloilo Harbor, P. I., January 11, 1899.

Mr. R. LOPEZ, President Federal State of Bisayas.

SIR: I would be glad at any time to receive any of your people, and especially yourself, who wish to consult me, on board the Newport. They will be safe and can return at their pleasure. We are making no seizures of boats or property except that necessary to maintain our existence here on transports.

Very respectfully,

M. P. MILLER,
Brigadier-General, U. S. V., Commanding.

On the same date Acting Asst. Surg. Henry Du R. Phelan appeared before the general committee of the so-called Estado Federal de Bisayas, Iloilo, and concerning which he submits the following report:

Report of an interview between Lieut. Henry Du R. Phelan, acting assistant surgeon, Sixth Artillery, with the government of the Federal State of Bisayas.

ILOILO, January 11, 1899.

At the meeting were present, President Roque Lopez and Gens. Martin Delgado, Ananio Diocno, Pablo Araneta, chief of expeditionary forces from Manila, and various other military chiefs; Lawyer Raimundo Melliza; Francisco Soriano, and others.

General Miller's letter was presented and handed over to the interpreter, and also the letter of Major-General Otis, which was given by General Miller to Lieutenant Woodward to be read before the meeting. Both these letters were then read and the discussion opened. Lawyer Raimundo Melliza did most of the talking on behalf of the government, and he said in effect, replying to General Miller's letter, that all that the Americans owned was Manila. I said: "Without us you would not have accomplished any results. When the war commenced there was actually no rebellion in these islands, and you took advantage of our war and again rose in revolt. At the beginning of it your chiefs were not here, having fled the country."

The president and the lawyer denied this, saying that their chiefs had gone abroad to purchase arms, and that although they were not in actual warfare, their government was still in existence, and, in fact, they had been in constant rebellion since 1896, since Spain had never lived up to her agreement with Aguinaldo at the time of his withdrawal from the country. Referring to the sacrifices of lives and money which the United States had made in conquering this country, the lawyer said that they also had made great sacrifices in lives, and that they had a right to this country, which they had fought for, and that we are here now to take from them what they had won by fighting; that they had been our allies, and we had used them as such; and that now we are not showing them any gratitude for the help they gave us.

I replied that we both worked together and had driven the Spanish out, and that they are now getting their liberty as a result. They felt hurt about the words "the sovereignty of Spain and of the United States," which appeared in our communications, and said it was simply changing from one to another, and, while they knew the Spaniards, they did not know us. I told them that we are different from any European nation, and of an entirely different character from the Spaniards; that the people of Manila like us; that we spent a great deal of money in their city, and that business was thriving there as it had not been before.

Mr. Melliza said it would take two years for them to know us, and meanwhile we would establish a military government here, taking charge of all their offices. I replied that military occupation was a necessity for a time, and that it was customary to establish one in new possessions, and that as soon as order was assured it would be withdrawn. All that we wish now is to control the custom-house, the post-office, the captaincy of the port, and to establish good order in the city. They smiled at this and remarked: "We have fought for independence and feel that we have the power of governing and need no assistance; we are showing it now. You might inquire of the foreigners if it were not so." They inquired the meaning of the word "Territory" as differing from State. I explained to them what a Territorial and a State government was, and assured them that their liberty would be practically as great under such Territorial or State government as if they were independent, and, moreover, that they would be free from any foreign interference.

Mr. Melliza replied, smilingly: "Since you say you are so friendly and wish to grant us so much liberty, why not have us a protectorate?" I told him that I had no power to discuss that; that our order was to occupy all the islands. They stated that their orders were not to allow us to disembark, and that they were powerless to allow us to come in without express orders from their government. I asked them why they had not communicated with Aguinaldo, adding that we had waited patiently for ten days for a reply. They said it was partly our fault, because they wanted us to give them a vessel to take their commission back to Manila. I told them that we had no vessels to spare.

Mr. Francisco Soriano, one of the commissioners on the transport Newport with us, took the floor and said: "On Wednesday evening before Christmas General Otis promised the commission sent by him on the Newport that they should ask the North Americans for a steamer in case they would be unable to solve some urgent questions regarding the government of the Bisayas, in order that they might consult the central government." This promise was made known to them, according to Francisco Soriano, by Mr. John MacLeod on the morning of December 25, 1898.

I asked what proof he had to offer, as I knew nothing of this promise. He replied that he had no written proof, as the promises were made verbally. I told him that the city was in our power, and that we could destroy it at any time, but we did not wish to commit a hostile act but wanted to land as friends. Lawyer Melliza replied that he cared nothing about the city; that we could destroy it if we wished; that it was not theirs, as the foreigners owned about all the property. "We will withdraw to the mountains and repeat the North American Indian warfare. You must not forget that."

In regard to the claim that we made of the Philippine Islands by right of conquest and treaty stipulations, Lawyer Melliza said: "International law forbids a nation to make a contract in regard to taking the liberty from its colonies. Iloilo was never surrendered to you; you have no right to it. It was ceded to us by General Rios, who, upon retiring, granted us our liberty, and thus recognized our independence." I replied that whatever agreement General Rios might have made with them at the time of his withdrawal from Iloilo was illegal, as it was posterior to the treaty of Paris. Lawyer Melliza replied that they knew nothing of the treaty of Paris, as they had not received any information concerning it; that they were bound by the central government of Luzon only.

I told them that their government was not recognized by any nation; that all the world was aware of the cession of the Philippines to the United States by the treaty of Paris. He replied that it mattered not, as they now had agents in Europe seeking recognition for their government. Upon inquiring when they had last heard of Aguinaldo, Lawyer Melliza replied that they had heard from him about January 5, 1899, via Capiz; that the message had been brought by Gen. Ananio Diocno and Gen. Pablo Araneta to the effect that Aguinaldo wanted the Bisayas government not to allow the landing of American forces until an agreement had been made with him.

They then requested once more that commissioners be sent to Malolos to obtain the orders of Aguinaldo, and desired them to be sent at once. I asked Lawyer Melliza if Aguinaldo said we could occupy the city would they agree to it. He replied emphatically they would.

At the conclusion of the meeting it was said that, as this question involved the integrity of the entire republic, it could not be further discussed here, but must be referred to the Malolos government.

Correspondence before Cebu.

REPORT OF COMMANDING OFFICER SUBDISTRICT OF CEBU.

HEADQUARTERS SUBDISTRICT OF CEBU, VISAYAN MILITARY DISTRICT, AND
FIRST SEPARATE BRIGADE, EIGHTH ARMY CORPS,
Cebu, P. I., July 28, 1899.

ACTING ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
Visayan Military District, Iloilo, P. I.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report:

* * * * * * *

With this additional force it was considered desirable and practicable to extend our occupation to other parts of the island. This with a view of exploding certain absurd reports in circulation among the credulous natives as to the manner of people the Americans are, as well as to carry out the general instructions to be followed in the occupation of the towns of this island, which were in each case given, and are as follows:

"Take down and keep down the insurgent flag wherever found; respect the rights of persons and property in the territory occupied; treat the inhabitants thereof with equal and exact justice, at all times tempered with kindness, with a view to establishing friendly relations between the people of this island and the United States; set a good example for the natives by enforcing strict discipline in your own command; preserve law and order, but in so doing avoid bloodshed or trouble of any kind if possible, and meet such other and future emergencies as may unexpectedly arise (and which it is impossible to anticipate, and therefore cover by specific orders) by the exercise of that God-given intelligence that an officer is presumed to possess as a prerequisite to holding a commission in the Army of the United States."

On June 16, Company I, Twenty-third United States Infantry, under command of First Lieut. F. G. Stritzinger, jr., occupied the town of San Nicolas, taking quarters in the public tribunal. The occupation of San Nicolas was consummated without trouble or disagreeable incident of any kind, and the tribunal was taken as quarters with the consent of the president of the junta popular, given at a conference with the commanding officer of this subdistrict, the former at the same time expressing the pleasure and security our occupation would give the people of his town.

On June 17 I was surprised at receiving a communication, written in Spanish, from this self-same president of San Nicolas, a translated copy of which is as follows:

"The president of this town of San Nicolas, representing all its junta popular and neighborhood, whose opinion, expressed in a mass meeting held to-day, protests to the troops of the army of occupation and before the civilized world against the act taking place to-day—of the said army placing its flag on the tribunal of this town—which (act) is coupled in no wise with those boastings of civilization in this century, called the enlightened one.

"Then, according to the protest on the occupation of the place and the city of Cebu before the intimation made by the commander of the gunboat Petrel, of his nation, on the 22d of February last, and by lack of elements of resistance only, there was understood in said delivery the boundary of the city, pending the events in Manila, where resides Señor Emilio Aguinaldo, only chief of state (recognized?) in this archipelago, to whose dispositions in everything these inhabitants give heed.

"If the necessity of lodging is that which has obliged said forces to occupy this town, as their commander has intimated to the undersigned president, this town, obeying the hospitable sentiments of its inhabitants, gives up its dwellings, but there being no jurisdiction of the ground occupied and given as a principle they (the forces) can not fly thereon the flag of their nation; whereby it protests against said act, contrary to international right, against the integrity of the territory.

"San Nicolas, June 16, 1899.

[Seal of junta popular.] "SANTIAGO FERRARIS."

The day following the receipt of this communication the president and his minister of justice called to advise me that the protest was filed for the sole purpose of pacifying a small and lawless element of the people of the island, who are opposed to American occupation, but whom they feared would assassinate them (the junta popular) in case they did not thus openly protest; but that, in fact, the better element of the town and island were glad of our occupation and the security it guaranteed the people in the town, and that they were delegated by the better citizens of their community to supplement the protest filed with these assurances.

Very respectfully,

THOS. R. HAMER,
Lieutenant-Colonel First Idaho Volunteer Infantry, Commanding.

In view of the verbal intimation made by the commanding officer of the U. S. S. Petrel, of the United States squadron, to this government, demanding the surrender of the garrison and city of Cebu, to be accompanied by the hoisting of the American flag in the peremptory term of fourteen hours, the assemblee magna, convoked for its consideration, and the members of which are representative of all the vital forces of the country, agreed unanimously to accede to said demand in view of the superiority of the American forces; but without omitting to point out that neither the government of this province nor any of the inhabitants thereof have the power to conclude decisive acts prohibited by the honorable president of the Filipino republic, Señor Emilio Aguinaldo, our legitimate ruler, recognized as such in virtue of his indisputable capabilities of just government and illustrious generalship and universal suffrage.

Sad and painful is the situation of this city, without means of defense and obliged to act contrary to its own convictions; in view of which it declares before the whole world that the occupation of this town is not based on any of the laws which form the code of civilized nations, which could hardly expect to behold such scenes at the end of a century called the enlightened one.

We are told of conquests, of protectorates, of cessions made by the Spaniards; as if the archipelago, and especially our souls, were merchandise subject to barter, when a single one is worth more than a thousand worlds of that metal called vile, perhaps for the reason that it fascinates as the eyes of a serpent.

But, be that as it may, of all this the commanding officer must treat, as already stated, with Señor Aguinaldo, without whose acquiescence the act which is demanded from this government can not be legal.

A copy of this manifesto will be given to each of the consular agents established in this city, the greatest possible publicity will be given it, and we shall communicate with Aguinaldo, remitting him a copy of this document.

Given in Cebu, the 22d February, 1899.

LUIZ FLORES,
The Commander in Chief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] in behalf of the minority of the committee.

Mr. TELLER obtained the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will my colleague yield while I offer an amendment to the pending bill?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I offer an amendment to the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment to the bill itself?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado offers an amendment. Does the Senator from Colorado yield for this purpose?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 8. That an act adopted by the United States Philippine Commission on November 4, 1901, entitled "An act defining the crimes of treason, insurrection, sedition, conspiracies to commit such crimes, seditious utterances, whether written or spoken, the formation of secret political societies, the administering or taking of oaths to commit crimes or to prevent the discovering of the same, and the violation of oaths of allegiance, and prescribing punishment therefor," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. PATTERSON. Before my colleague commences his speech, I ask for a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	Heitfeld,	Pettus,
Allison,	Cullom,	Hoar,	Proctor,
Bacon,	Dubois,	Jones, Nev.	Quarles,
Bailey,	Fairbanks,	Kean,	Rawlins,

Carmack,	Gibson,	Mallory,	Teller,
Clark, Mont.	Hale,	Martin,	Wellington,
Clark, Wyo.	Hansbrough,	Patterson,	Wetmore.
Clay,	Hawley,	Perkins,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-seven Senators have responded to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, there is an amendment, which I offered some days ago, pending. I should like to ask the Senator who has the bill in charge whether he is willing to accept that amendment or not?

Mr. LODGE. My attention was called away.

Mr. TELLER. I want to know whether the Senator who has charge of the bill is willing to accept the amendment, that I offered the other day, to extend the Constitution and laws of the United States to the Philippine Islands?

Mr. LODGE. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read Mr. TELLER'S amendment, submitted on the 28th ultimo, to add to the bill the following as an additional section:

SEC. 8. That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said Philippine Archipelago as elsewhere within the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I do not accept that amendment at this stage.

Mr. TELLER. I will address myself to that question, I think, this afternoon, but before doing so I wish to offer another amendment to come in as an additional section. I send it to the desk, and I should like to have it read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire that the amendment shall be read now?

Mr. TELLER. I wish to have it read, and then I want to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add as a new section at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. —. That it is not intended by the Government of the United States to permanently annex the Philippine Islands as an integral part of the United States, but it is the determination of the United States to establish, with the consent and assistance of the inhabitants thereof, a government or governments suitable to their wants and condition, and that shall give to the inhabitants the control and administration of their local affairs, such as the raising of revenue and the disposition thereof, the maintenance of peace and order in the several communities of said islands that has been or that may be organized by the people thereof.

That there is no intention on the part of the Government of the United States to deprive the people of said islands of their liberties or to subjugate or oppress them, but, on the contrary, to secure to them the blessings of a free government of their own choice that shall recognize and protect the rights and interests of all the people of said islands.

That it is necessary to the establishment of such government that peace and order shall prevail on said islands, in order that the people thereof may be enabled to exercise the rights of freemen and to have free expression of their wishes in the form and character of the government under which they desire to live.

To this end the Government of the United States will at all times cooperate with the peaceably disposed inhabitants in the formation of such governments, and will defend and protect such government or governments so organized from any foreign interference or attempted control by foreign powers until such government or governments shall be able to defend themselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not know whether it is in order as an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not at present.

Mr. TELLER. Then I will give notice that I shall move it at the proper time.

Mr. President, the greatest question that the American people have considered since the close of the civil war has been before the Senate for the last two or three weeks. The Senator who has the bill in charge gets somewhat impatient that there is not more expedition. We have had to-day a carefully prepared speech by the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], which was listened to with great interest by some of us, and yet it seems to attract no particular attention on the other side of the Chamber. I observed during the day that from 7 to 12 Senators would be the greatest number seen on the other side almost all the time after the speech commenced. So I can not myself hope to receive any particular attention from the other side of the Chamber.

I am not going to submit the remarks that I am about to make for the sake of making a speech. I am going to put myself on record upon this question. I am going to leave for those who may come after me my protest against certain things and my disapproval of certain things as I see them.

And, Mr. President. I am not going to be disturbed by the unparliamentary and indecent charge that shall be made here, and has already been made, against those of us who do not agree with the Administration policy, that we are less patriotic and less interested in the welfare of the Republic than those who see fit to pursue a policy unheard of in American legislation, who see fit to depart from the fundamental principles upon which this Government has been administered for more than a hundred years, and then charge that all those who do not ageee with them are moved either by intense partisanism or because they have not the welfare of the Republic at heart.

I heard the other night, as we were in the closing hours of the day's session, a Senator sitting a few seats from me charged with being guilty of treason, and it was stated on the floor of the Senate that if he was not shielded by his position as a United States Senator he would come within the provisions of the Constitution and the statute against treason. I do not know that I shall submit myself to the criticism that he did, but, Mr. President, I want to say before I proceed to take up the discussion of this question that no suggestion of that kind with reference to me will deter me from saying what I think I ought to say on this floor. It is not worth while for me to express my astonishment as a lawyer that in a body composed very largely of lawyers, and who are supposed to be familiar with constitutional law, anyone should have ever made such a suggestion.

Mr. President, away back in the early history of this Government of ours the courts of the United States settled what is treason. The Constitution, with a deliberation and a care that perhaps could be found in no other constitution in the world on that subject, defined what treason is. And why did the framers of the Constitution define it? Under the pretense of a lack of allegiance and devotion to the sovereignty of a nation have been committed the worst crimes in the history of mankind. It was easy for the king to say, You are guilty of treason. It is easy yet in some parts of the world. But, Mr. President, in the days of British absolutism it sometimes occurred, and yet no court in Great Britain would have ever declared that the expression of sympathy with rebellion, even at home in Great Britain, was an overt act and that the parties would be guilty of treason. Our Constitution made it impossible that mere words of themselves, unaccompanied by overt and forcible acts, could be treason.

I do not think it is necessary that I should acquit the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] of this charge. I suppose the charge was lightly made, and I suppose the Senator who made it thought it was a matter of very little consequence to stand up here and charge a Senator with being guilty of treason. Treason is the crime of crimes; it has been said a crime so great that there is not any accessory to treason either before or after the fact. A man must either be guilty of treason or he is not guilty of anything relating to treason. He may be guilty of sedition; he may be, under some of the modern laws we have heard of, amenable to the penalties provided by them, but no man is guilty of treason unless he does some overt act. I might stand here for weeks and express my sympathy with the Filipinos, if I choose to do so, and I should not be guilty of treason.

I do not intend at this particular moment to take up this most remarkable legislation, if you please to dignify it by that name, which we have had in the Philippine Islands. I shall, before I get through, address myself to that proposition. I shall attempt to show that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] wasted his time the other night by explaining that we were attacking statutes already on our statute books. It is true the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] complained that the imposition of the penalties prescribed in one of those statutes would be exceedingly severe in any country, and that they never have been attempted to be put into force in the United States, even during the greatest internecine war that the world ever saw, with the passions of men on both sides perhaps as high as they ever could be raised.

If the Philippine statutes which were transmitted to us the other day should be read to-morrow, we would find that they are merciful and humane compared with the statute which was read here to which the Senator from Ohio gave his personal approval. I do not, however, intend to take up that question now; it is late in the afternoon, and I am going to discuss another phase of this question. When I get through with that I am going to stop, and resume to-morrow, provided, of course, the Senate will allow me to do so.

Mr. President, there was a question here in 1898 as to whether the Constitution by its own force and without the assistance of legislation went into the Territories of the United States. For myself I had no question on that point. I expressed myself very positively that the Constitution of the United States was not in the Philippine Islands, and could not get there until by some positive enactment of law we put it there. I also called the attention of the Senate then, as I mean to do now, to the fact that we have everywhere given to the Territories which we subsequently made States, by positive enactments, the protection of the Constitution so far as it was applicable.

When I say the Constitution of the United States does not go to the Philippine Islands without some positive declaration of law, I do not mean to assert that the great fundamental principles which underlie every republican government in the world do not go there, but they are not given to us by the Constitution; they belong to the form of government under which we live. Whenever you undertake to execute a law of any kind, you are restrained by those fundamental principles. Do you mean to say that anywhere in the United States you could try a man for a crime, acquit him, and then try him over again? I mean, of course, any place over which our jurisdiction extends. Do you mean to say that in any place where the jurisdiction of the United States extends you can compel a man to condemn himself, as is done in the French and Spanish courts, and in some of the other courts of Europe? Why, Mr. President, the attempt would be horrifying to the American people. Do you, Senators, who have heard that so-called law read, mean to say that there is any power that can be given to an American anywhere in the world to make any such laws?

If you create a legislative body anywhere and give it full power to legislate, do you suppose it could pass such a law as that? Do you suppose, when you gave to the President power to create and put there what you call a "commission," that you gave him the power, or that you gave the Commission the power, to pass a law which invades the liberty of the press, the freedom of the person, the liberty of speech, or the liberty of assembling together, as all free men have the right to do? Do you think that can be done anywhere and that the Constitution need to be there to make that an invalid act?

Mr. President, I want to put the Constitution of the United States over the Philippine Islands, and I know when it is put there it will not embarrass, as I shall be told it will on the other side of the Chamber, the administration of public affairs there. It will carry with it the writ of habeas corpus, but it will not carry with it the right of trial by jury. That must be done by positive law. If the Philippine Commission can legislate, as they profess they have a right to do and as they have tried to do, they might have given to those people trial by jury; but they have not attempted to do so. It will not do for anybody to get up here and say, "If you send the Constitution there, you are going to embarrass the administration of public affairs there by creating a condition not suitable to the people of those islands." I repeat, the extension of the Constitution over a given territory does not give the right to trial by jury where the law has not so provided.

The Supreme Court did say as to the Territory of Iowa and the Territory of Utah that they could not deprive their citizens of the right of trial by jury. But, Mr. President, the Constitution had been extended there, and the right of trial by jury had been given to those people. Subsequently amendments were made, which the courts declined to accept, stating that when the statute said a man should have a trial by jury it meant by a jury of 12 men of the neighborhood, and not 6. How did it come about that a jury must be composed of 12 men? Is it in the Constitution? No; it can not be found there; but it is the common-law jury; it is the jury of the English people; it is the jury which every lawyer recognizes when the statute uses that word; it is a part of the unwritten law that goes with English and with American law wherever it extends that a jury means 12 men, not 3, and not 6.

Why can we not put the Constitution of the United States in force in the Philippine Islands? We have already established a court there. I do not know exactly upon what theory it has been established; but it professes, at least, to be a court, and I suppose that court would recognize the right of an imprisoned person to be tried before it to determine whether he is rightly imprisoned or not. Until a court is established in any Territory it is impossible that the writ of habeas corpus can be in force; but when it is established, I myself believe that then the court would be authorized by the general authorization to exercise the power the courts have always exercised in the issue of that writ.

Mr. President, I want to say here that that writ is not an English writ; it is not an American writ; it is a writ that came out of the old Roman law. That writ was in existence in Spain in 1250. It was called into exercise by the courts of that country even at that early day. When you have got the appliances and the opportunity the writ can be issued, and relief may be had under it; but there are some things that you can not have unless the Constitution is present and in force.

Who can give any reason why the Constitution should not be in force in the Philippine Islands? Why should it not be in force in Porto Rico? Why should it not be in force everywhere, so far as it is applicable, where the flag of the United States floats as the emblem of sovereignty and power?

Mr. President, we have not withheld the Constitution from any portion of our country. We declared in the very first instance after we had adopted it that the legislation in the Northwest Territory should be consistent with the Constitution, and that these fundamental principles, which are recognized in the Constitution, should extend, so far as they were applicable, there, and that in their legislation they must conform themselves to it. Later we declared that the Constitution should absolutely be in force and effect in Louisiana, in Missouri, and in various other Territories. I have a list of them here. I want to call attention to this matter for a few moments only. I am now speaking as to my amendment. As I have said, I am not going to take up the general question until I first dispose of this question.

In the early legislation regarding Florida and some other portions of the country we prohibited the exercise of certain powers which had been exercised by some legislatures in some parts of the world, such as the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts, etc. I am not going to waste time on that.

When we organized the Territory of Missouri in 1812 we provided:

> The general assembly shall have power to make laws in all cases, both civil and criminal, for the good government of the people of the said Territory, not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Provision was made that no ex post facto law should be passed, and various other matters were provided for.

When Wisconsin was organized into a Territory in 1836 this provision was made:

> That the laws of the United States are hereby extended over and shall be in force in said Territory. And also that the laws of the Territory of Michigan shall be extended over the said Territory.

When Iowa was made a Territory in 1838 it was provided:

> That the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Wisconsin and to its inhabitants; and the existing laws of the Territory of Wisconsin shall be extended over said Territory, so far as the same be not incompatible with the provisions of this act, subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed by the governor and legislative assembly of the said Territory of Iowa; and further, the laws of the United States are hereby extended over and shall be in force in said Territory so far as the same or any provisions thereof may be applicable.

Oregon was made a Territory in 1848. The sixth section of the act creating the Territory provided:

> That the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

By section 26 of the same act the revenue laws of the United States were extended over the Territory of Oregon, and on March 3, 1849, by a special act the revenue laws of the United States were extended over the Territory of California.

We organized the Territory of New Mexico in 1850. Section 17 of the organic act provided:

> That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicaple shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of New Mexico as elsewhere within the United States.

The Territory of Utah was organized in 1850. The organic act provided:

> That the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory of Utah, so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable.

When Kansas and Nebraska were admitted there was an exceptional condition of affairs, as you all remember. This is the provision which was then made in the organic act:

> That the provisions of an act entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters," approved February 12, 1793, and the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend and supplementary to the aforesaid act," approved September 18, 1850, be, and the same are hereby, declared to extend to and be in full force within the limits of said Territory of Nebraska.

Section 32 of the act provided:

> That the Constitution, and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Kansas as elsewhere within the United States, except the eighth section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 6, 1820, which, being inconsistent with the principle of nonintervention by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories, as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the "compromise measures," is hereby declared inoperative and void.

The Territory of Washington was organized in 1858. Section 6 of the organic act provided:

> That the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is making a very interesting speech, Mr. President, and I notice that there are only eight Senators on his side of the Chamber listening to him. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. TELLER. There are as many Senators on this side as there are on the other side.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. SPOONER, and others. Oh, no.

Mr. TELLER. Very nearly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator evidently miscalculates his influence.

Mr. BACON. He is calling the sinners, not the righteous, to repentance.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	Kean,	Pritchard,
Allison,	Culberson,	Kearns,	Proctor,
Bacon,	Cullom,	Lodge,	Quarles,
Bailey,	Dillingham,	McComas,	Simmons,
Bate,	Fairbanks,	McCumber,	Spooner,
Berry,	Foraker,	McEnery,	Teller,
Beveridge,	Frye,	Mallory,	Turner,
Burrows,	Gamble,	Nelson,	Wellington,
Burton,	Hanna,	Patterson,	Wetmore.
Carmack,	Hansbrough,	Perkins,
Clark, Wyo.	Hawley,	Pettus,
Clay,	Hoar,	Platt, Conn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-five Senators have responded to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. Owing to the unfortunate condition of affairs in Delaware, that State being without representation, I believe 45 constitute a quorum.

Since I sat down a Senator has said to me that he did not entirely understand my views upon the habeas corpus question. I want to make myself clear on that point. I think whenever a court is organized with general jurisdiction, that court can issue a writ of habeas corpus just as it can issue any other writ which is known to the practice of courts. The difference between that and a jury is, that while the court must take notice that a jury is composed of 12 men, yet there must be some method of calling the jury together. A jury is not composed of every 12 men who may be picked up; it requires machinery to determine who shall compose a jury; and for that reason, until there is legislation, it is utterly impossible to have a jury.

Perhaps I used another term which ought to be corrected, as Senators have asked me in regard to that also. I say the Constitution is put into the Territories practically when we declare that the Constitution shall be in effect in a Territory. That is practically enacting the Constitution into a law. It is a law now, but that is enacting it as a law for the Territory.

Mr. SPOONER. It is put there as a law?

Mr. TELLER. I suppose if it was concluded that the Constitution was not doing any good and might do harm Congress could repeal it, as they could repeal any other provision of law. That question was somewhat mooted and doubted in a certain case, where the Supreme Court raised the question whether when the Constitution had once been put in force it could be withdrawn; but I should say the Constitution is nothing but a law, though it can not be repealed in the usual way that a law can be repealed, so far as its relation to the States is concerned, because the Constitution itself provides how it shall be amended or changed.

Mr. President, to continue on the line I was pursuing when interrupted, section 16 of the enabling act, in the case of Colorado, provided:

> That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Colorado as elsewhere within the United States.

Section 16 of the act to organize the Territory of Nevada, approved March 2, 1861, provided:

> That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Nevada as elsewhere within the United States.

Section 16 of the act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Dakota, which included the present States of North and South Dakota and a portion of Wyoming, provided:

That the Constitution and all laws of the United States are made applicable to the Territory.

Section 3 of the enabling act of Arizona provided:

That there shall neither be slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said Territory otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted; and all acts and parts of acts, either of Congress or of the Territory of New Mexico, establishing, regulating, or in any way recognizing the relation of master and slave in said Territory are hereby repealed.

Section 13 of the act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho provided:

That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Idaho as elsewhere within the United States.

Section 13 of the act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana, approved May 26, 1864, provided:

That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Montana as elsewhere within the United States.

The act approved June 25, 1868, to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming, in section 16 provided:

That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Wyoming as elsewhere within the United States.

The act to provide a temporary government for Oklahoma Territory, approved May 2, 1890, provided:

That the Constitution and all the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall, except as far as modified by this act, have the same force and effect as elsewhere in the United States; and all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are as to their effect in said Territory of Oklahoma hereby repealed.

Mr. President, I believe the Supreme Court in one of its latest decisions has held that the Constitution is not in force in the Philippine Islands. I confess that I speak with great hesitation when I refer to that decision, for I really have found some difficulty in determining exactly what the court has decided, although I do not have much trouble in finding what the judges have decided.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] calls my attention to section 1891 of the Revised Statutes, which was enacted, I think, in 1862. I confess I had overlooked that. It is as follows:

The Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within all the organized Territories, and in every Territory hereafter organized, as elsewhere within the United States.

I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he thinks that carries the Constitution and laws of the United States to the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has thanked me for calling his attention to the section——

Mr. TELLER. I am obliged to the Senator for that, but I want further information from the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it does not.

Mr. TELLER. I agree with him. I do not think it does, because I do not believe it can be said that the Philippines are organized territory within the meaning of that section. It seems to me they are not. I do not know whether we shall have an organized territory there at all, because I have not had time to examine the bill in reference to it which is pending here and which, I am told, is to come up some time. Whether that will make it an organized territory within the meaning of that law I do not know.

If it should, then, of course, this amendment of mine would not be required; but inasmuch as I do not know whether that proposed statute is going to pass, I should like to have this amendment made a provision of law. I can conceive of no objection that can be made to saying that the Constitution and laws of the United States, so far as applicable, shall be in force in the Philippine Islands.

I believe, while I am on my feet and before I sit down, I will say another thing or two about the islands. I do not want anybody when I speak to-morrow, if I go on, to get up and ask me whether I approve of this thing that somebody has said or whether I disapprove of it. On this question I am going to act upon my own judgment and not somebody else's.

I committed myself very thoroughly in December, 1898, to the policy I thought we should pursue. I said in most unequivocal terms that we ought apply the principle of the fourth resolution to these islands. The resolution in words does not apply to these islands. That declaration, which we made to the world, was that we were not going into this intervention, and, as we knew, war, for the purpose of profit or gain, and we applied it only to Cuba. But I thought beyond that was the great declaration to the world that "we are not going after profit by this; we do not propose to take any islands; we do not propose to take land. We are not doing this for gain. We are doing this in behalf of humanity."

There is not a Senator here who will not recall the disturbance which existed in Europe, as shown through the public press everywhere—in Germany, France, England, Italy, and Spain—where we were charged with duplicity and hypocrisy. It was said "the Americans are not going into this because they are disturbed by the unhappy condition of Cuba. They are going into it for expansion."

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator regard the acquisition of Porto Rico as a violation of what is called the Teller resolution?

Mr. TELLER. I never complained of that, because the people of Porto Rico, I believe, wanted us to take jurisdiction of the island. I have never heard that these people complained, and if it had covered that, we would have had a right, of course, to have extended our protection to them in the shape we did extend it to them, if they wanted it.

I do not mean to say now that if the people of Cuba want to be annexed and we want to annex them, that we can not annex them under that provision, but I do say that we can not annex them unless they do agree to it, and they must agree to it with unanimity, not a few rich people who would be benefited financially, but the whole population.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me to suggest, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the action as to Porto Rico, if I recollect rightly, was distinctly put upon the ground that it was an equivalent for a war indemnity, which it was conceded Spain was not in a condition to pay.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the people of Porto Rico wanted us to take the island.

Mr. BACON. That is an additional reason.

Mr. TELLER. Yes, sir; that is a good reason, but it would not have been a good reason, in my opinion, if the people had objected.

Mr. BACON. I concede that.

Mr. SPOONER. I voted for that resolution, and I understood it to be a declaration by the United States to the world that we were not going into war with Spain for the purpose of making Cuba an American asset.

Mr. TELLER. That is true, that we were not going into it for the purpose of despoiling Spain, but to relieve the people of their distress.

I have seen it stated in the press within a few days that I introduced that resolution because I had some intimation that we were not going to do what the history of the Senate shows we declared we were going to do for two years. I intend to take up that question to some extent before this debate is over and show that we were in favor of independence of the island of Cuba. I repeat that the resolution was introduced by me for the purpose of its influence abroad. I do not know exactly how much trouble there was abroad, and I suppose we never shall know, either. It is a great controversy amongst the diplomats of the world whether it was England or France or Germany that proposed intervention in our affairs by saying we must keep our hands off of Cuba. I do not suppose there is anybody here who does not believe that there was such an attempt made.

Now, whether the inception was on the part of Great Britain, as the Germans and French declare, and Russia stood out and said "No," or whether it came from Austria, and Great Britain said, "If the rest of the great powers will go in, we will say to them 'keep your hands off,'" I do not know. But the fact that that is a subject of controversy amongst them shows that there was a sentiment at that time to charge us with attempting to do more than we were declaring we were doing, and to justify themselves in saying, "We must intervene to protect Spain from this despoiling power of the United States."

So I think myself, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, that it was a wholesome resolution; and some day I mean to take it up and show that the criticisms upon it, made, for instance, by my illustrious friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], that it was hastily done, are not correct. But I do not care about doing that to-night. That is a chapter by itself, which I propose to take up later.

I do not suppose we can get a vote on this proposition now. I should be delighted to hear some one who is not going to vote for it give me some reason why he is not, but I do not suppose anyone will. I suppose the majority here, having the power, will simply content themselves with voting it down, without any excuse. Then when they go to the public they will make the best excuse they can possibly think of. One Senator will be able to make one excuse as to why he did not vote for it, and another Senator will be able to make another as to why he did not vote for it. But it will be a most remarkable thing if the 10,000,000 people over there, whom it is said we are to keep and hold and maintain under our sovereignty, whether they will it or whether they do not, shall share all the burdens and have none of the benefits of American law.

I am sorry myself that the Constitution did not follow the flag. I wish it had. I did not ever believe it did, and I do not believe now that the court erred in that matter. I do not believe the Constitution follows the flag. But it ought to follow the flag. It is in our power to make it follow the flag. But I do believe that the principles of free government follow the flag to the extent that no enactment, whether it be in the name of the President of the United States or in the name of the Congress of the United States, can violate certain great fundamental principles. One is the right of free speech. The other is the right of the people to assemble themselves together in orderly way, not a tumultuous way, but an orderly way; and the statute which was read by the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] a few minutes since is a violation of every fundamental principle of free people and of free government.

However, I do not care to go on further to-night. I know that there will not be a quorum here a few minutes after I begin to speak, and while I am not very much disturbed whether there is a quorum or whether there is not, I do not care to commence at this late hour of the evening a speech which will probably last two or three hours.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if the Senator from Colorado prefers to go on in the morning, that is perfectly agreeable to me. I do not care to press him to speak at this late hour if he does not desire to.

Mr. TELLER. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive bnsiness. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 11, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 10, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let Thy blessing, Almighty God, our Father, descend upon us this day. Make us to know Thy will. Give us the disposition and the strength to do it. And, O Lord, let Thy blessing descend upon all who are in anxiety, all who are sick and afflicted; especially let Thy blessing descend upon the President and his companion. Spare the life, we beseech Thee, of their child, that he may grow up to be a comfort and a blessing to them in their declining years. This we ask in the name of Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

OLEOMARGARINE BILL.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 9206, the oleomargarine bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LACEY in the chair, for the further consideration of House bill 9206.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the oleomargarine bill, and the Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine.

Mr. FEELY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit the bill reported by the majority and the whole report, and the bill submitted by the minority and the whole of the minority report, to be printed as an appendix to the remarks which I shall submit on this question.

The debate, so far as it has proceeded on this question, has disclosed the very great and deep interest of the various constituencies represented upon the floor of this House. It has shown a varied interest. We have heard words of encouragement for the cow from southwestern Iowa and for the dairymaid of North Carolina. We have heard representations here for the Texas steer, and we have heard representations from some of the packing interests.

I do not know that it is necessary to state on the floor of this House the various interests to be argued for and represented here, but I will submit that on this great question of taxation, this question of the right and propriety of using the taxing power of the Government, claimed by some to be supreme, is a question that ought to command an inquiry into the conscience of members, as well as into the consciences of the constituents of members. It sounds well, it will read well in the RECORD, it will do well for home consumption, for members on the floor of this House to stand here and say that they represent the consciences of their constituents.

There are two classes of statesmanship which have become manifest during the last decade of American politics. One school is the school that has its ear ever to the ground listening for the word from home on every question, and the other school is the school that weighs public questions in the balance of common sense, in the balance of intelligent and wise legislation, and casts its vote on the floor of this House in favor of the conclusion rather than by the latter process. Members who expect to gain the good will of the constituent body, always placing the ear close to the ground, may sometimes be swerved from what they would consider the plain duty by listening to the sometimes misguided cry of their constituents, whether made manifest, as in this case, by postal cards prepared in the city of Chicago or by letters or communications from the public press in other various districts.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if this Republic is going to secure the best advice, the soundest judgment from members on this floor, there ought to be used in the determination of every question here that cool judgment which comes from a conviction well grounded after study rather than from a postal card indited in some market of the world, sent to a farmer, addressed and sent here to a member of this House.

Members have stood on the floor of this House and have courageously stated that they granted to every member the right to vote as his conscience dictated. The right to vote, said some, as the consciences of the constituents dictate; but I submit to you when the last day has come—I mean the last day of your Congressional service, and I appreciate fully that the last day of Congressional service to some of you is very far ahead—when the last day of Congressional service has come, you will be sounder and freer in your own mind and your consciences will be more easily composed if you know that to the disposition of every question you have brought sound judgment, rather than fear caused by the hue and cry of constituents, who are many times illy advised on the question about which they would advise you.

Now, to come down to the discussion in specie of the various provisions of this bill, I desire to state that I agree with all who have declared that the necessity was evident for legislation on this subject. I think my experience and locality permits me to agree with both majority and minority on this committee that there is a great amount of fraud connected with the retail traffic in oleomargarine. And there may be some fraud connected with the disposition of the wholesale trade in oleomargarine. And after three days of extensive debate, after the records were ransacked for evidence of frauds, you brought forth only one manufacturer who had been detected, who had been unquestionably going beyond his bounds as a wholesaler in oleomargarine.

And the gentleman from Wisconsin rose here and read a long article detailing how this manufacturer told his retail consumers how to furnish oleomargarine that would approach butter in color at different seasons of the year. That was the one instance submitted on the floor of this House, and there is not a member here, and there will not be a member, who will attempt to condone the actions of that one wholesaler in the business of oleomargarine.

Mr. Chairman, the minority of this committee insists that because there is fraud in the retail business of oleomargarine, because there has been one instance, because there has been perhaps two instances, of nefarious and unjustifiable conduct in the wholesale business of oleomargarine, this House has not the moral right or the power to stamp out the industry. I have heard a great deal about fraud in oleomargarine. I have heard the voice of the gentleman from Wisconsin and the voices of the gentlemen from Minnesota and southwestern Iowa raised here against the frauds in oleomargarine. Against whom have you been talking, gentlemen? Have you been making Don Quixotes of yourselves by fighting a windmill? Everyone understands about the frauds. You do not deceive anybody but the constituents to whom you mail your addresses by talking about fraud. Fraud is admitted. But we say to you that the report made by the minority on this question provides in every respect a better solution for the question of the disposition of this fraud than your majority report.

The gentleman from Iowa stated here that the legislation of 1886 was based upon the same principle upon which the present measure is based. Is it? Does he forget some of the speeches made on the floor of this House by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri and the distinguished gentleman from Illinois? Let us see if this was, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, a question as to the deleteriousness of this product. We all remember—at least, we all remember having read—the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman who represents the greatest dairy district in this country, who is being attacked to-day by this same organization of busybodies, this same conscience keeper of the House of Representatives, for having been absent from his seat when this question was up one week ago. Let us see how roseate was his opinion of the cow. Let us see what a beautiful opinion he had of the product known as oleomargarine in 1886. On May 24 of that year he said:

During the Franco-Prussian war an inventive genius, by the name of M. Mége, discovered that the fats of such animals as cattle, horses, and dogs could be made into a substitute for butter. The war measure of the inventive Frenchman was seized and improved upon by the ever-inventive Yankee. Our Patent Office has been besieged with applications for patents.

After pointing out the various articles said to be used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, comprising 60 in all, Mr. Hopkins proceeded, as follows:

If these imitations of, and substitutes for, pure butter were marked or labeled what they really are, and the dealers and consumers advised of what they are purchasing and eating, no complaints would be made by the dairymen.

Continuing, Mr. HOPKINS said:

The great wrong is the fraud and deception practiced in selling such loathsome compounds for genuine butter. It is asserted by the friends of these bogus substitutes for butter that they are healthy. They are not. All kinds of filthy fats are used in their manufacture. Animals dying from all kinds of diseases are utilized, and after going through their bleaching and deodorizing processes are manufactured into oleomargarine and sold for pure butter.

Gentlemen of rare scholarship and scientific attainments have given this whole subject years of careful thought and study, and are unqualified in their statements of its unwholesome and loathsome character. Its consumption, in their judgment, leads to insanity, Bright's disease, and many of the ailments that undermine the strongest and most robust constitutions.

These extracts from the speeches of Mr. HOPKINS, and Mr. Hatch of Missouri, the father of the present act, show conclusively that these men honestly believed at the time that the statements were made that they were facts, and they were fully convinced that the measure they had under consideration was an honest and patriotic one, and one that should command the fullest support of this House. They show that even at that early day, before science had demonstrated to the world and the world had accepted the fact, that oleomargarine was wholesome and nutritious, there was no effort made or contemplated to strike down this industry, but all that was wanted by that measure was to prevent deleterious ingredients entering into the manufacture of this article. There was no talk in those days of repressive taxation, there was no talk of coming back to Congress and asking for a heavier tax on the product in the event that the tax they laid was insufficient to stamp out the industry.

All that was asked or contemplated by the promoters of that legislation was to provide sufficient revenue to properly police the manufacture and sale of that article, and provide sufficient protection so that it would be sold on the market for just what it was. That is all we need to-day; that is all the minority bill proposes to do.

Now, my dear friends from the Northwest, calm yourselves; be not dismayed, dispel your alarm; we do not intend to put in this product all the dead dog and animals that we can gather along the railroads, as was stated by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Hatch, and by Mr. HOPKINS, in 1886.

We propose that it shall be manufactured as honestly as it is to-day, and that its ingredients shall be as pure and wholesome and as healthy as every one of you admit it is to-day, and we propose that it shall be sold for exactly what it is.

The manufacturers of oleomargarine have done something to close the mouths of all the ranters against the dishonest product, oleomargarine. The only complaint we have at the present time outside of that distinguished body, that able conscience keeper of the House of Representatives, the National Dairy Union, whose members sit around with a tab in their hands watching the friends of the cow, the only complaint we have outside of that organization is the outcry of certain members of the House concerning fraud in the retail distribution of the product, and in one, or possibly two, instances in the wholesale distribution of it, not a word about deleterious products being used in its manufacture. I might read to you a long list of opinions presented by various chemists, whose opinions are entitled to consideration, but I will not occupy the time of the House in that way, knowing how many desire to be heard on this measure.

I want to submit, however, what is known to most of the people who have examined this question; that is, that the decisions of the courts of last resort have declared this product to be honest and nutritious and wholesome; and have declared it to be an article of commerce, even so far that the courts of last resort will take judicial notice of that fact.

In the case of Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania (171 U. S. Reports, p. 10) the Supreme Court quotes from the decision of Judge Hughes of the eastern district of Virginia in the case of Ex parte Scott and others, in which the circuit court for the eastern district of Virginia (66 Fed. Rep., 45) says:

> It is a fact of common knowledge that oleomargarine has been subjected to the severest scientific scrutiny, and has been adopted by every leading government in Europe, as well as America, for use by their armies and navies.

And the court says, on page 12:

> The article is a subject of export and is largely used in foreign countries. Upon all these facts we think it apparent that oleomargarine has become a proper subject of commerce among the States and with foreign nations.
>
> The general rule to be deduced from the decisions of this court is that a lawful article of commerce can not be wholly excluded from importation into a State from another State where it is manufactured or grown. A State has power to regulate the introduction of any article, including a food product, so as to insure purity of the article imported, but such police power does not include the total exclusion even of an article of food.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FEELY. With pleasure.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As I understand it, the proposed legislation does not strike at the making of oleo and selling it as oleo, or the making of oleo and keeping it in the form of oleo, but it strikes at the making of oleo and selling it as butter, contrary to the statute and contrary to good morals, which you say is a fraud.

Mr. FEELY. I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee that no matter what excuses may be made by members on the floor of the House on the ground that this is a revenue measure, the words of the pioneer in this legislation, the words of the gentleman from whom almost all of the members from Minnesota are trying to rob the credit of this measure, the words of that gentleman have made it plain to us that this was a repressive measure; that this was distinctly what the gentleman from Wisconsin, Governor Hoard, said was a repressive measure, and intended to stamp out oleomargarine as a competitor in the field with cow butter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As a competitor under the name of oleo, or as a competitor sold as butter?

Mr. FEELY. As a food product. The gentleman from Tennessee well knows that no man will stand on the floor of this House and that no committee will be found having the temerity to report a bill into this House that would allow the fraudulent substitution of and selling of oleomargarine in the markets as and for butter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You are opposed to that, then?

Mr. FEELY. I certainly am opposed to that.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FEELY. Yes.

Mr. THAYER. I should like to call attention to the wording of your minority bill, changing the phraseology of the statute as it now reads, transposing the word "only" to the position after "production" instead of placing it before the word "oleomargarine." I wish to ask you now if you intend by your bill, if it goes into effect, that a manufacturer of oleomargarine, having paid the special tax of $400 as a manufacturer, if he should sell his oleomargarine at wholesale at a place other than where it was manufactured, would be obliged to pay the other tax? It occurred to me, when you say "and who sells oleomargarine of his own production only at the place of manufacture," that that would be the effect of it, and that if a manufacturer sold oleomargarine of his own manufacture at any other place than the factory it would compel him to pay two taxes.

Mr. FEELY. As far as I am concerned, I believe that that is a misinterpretation of the law. I certainly intend that he shall not have to pay two taxes.

Mr. THAYER. Would he not be obliged to do so under the phraseology of the bill, changing it from the original statute, which provided that where one sells only oleomargarine of his own manufacture he is not obliged to pay the other tax? But you have transposed it so that if he sells oleomargarine of his own manufacture only at the place of manufacture he is not obliged to pay any other tax; but you do not relieve him from paying another tax for the sale at another place besides the place of manufacture.

Mr. FEELY. I am not sure that I fully comprehended the gentleman's question. I may have done so. If in the remarks that I am now about to make I show that I have comprehended the gentleman's question, I hope he will be satisfied with the answer that I make.

I am about to come to a discussion of the first section of this majority bill. The National Dairy Union has sent out a statement that may bring out an answer to the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I wish to address myself to the first section of this bill.

The first section of this bill is based on historic excise legislation. It is based on the bigoted desire of grasping creamery interests in this country to place an honest competitor on the same basis with the makers and sellers of intoxicating liquors.

It is based on the hint expressed by the Supreme Court's decision in the original-package case to the effect that Congress might grant permission to the several States to pass laws under the police powers of those respective States that would be effective, despite the grant to Congress by the Constitution of the right to regulate interstate and foreign commerce.

They propose to allow each State in this Union that so desires to place a proscriptive bar around its boundaries and prohibit even the introduction of this article. The time will come, Mr. Chairman, when a fuller appreciation of this product, oleomargarine, will warrant every man on the floor, whether he has been in receipt of postal cards from the National Dairy Union or not, in decrying any such legislation. Has it come to this, that the Houses of Congress are expected to pass measures whereby an honest and nutritious product—a product admittedly wholesome—is to be kept out of one State because the legislature of that State does not like it? You may pass this law to-day, but sensible men who deliberate upon legislation will not be hasty in passing a law that will allow any State in this Union to proscribe an honest, wholesome, and legitimate food product.

I personally am in favor of the broadest freedom in the disposition of this product, and I would not have the manufacturer pay a special tax at any place of sale, as referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I would have every manufacturer of the article have the lawful right to send it in the original package to any man, even in Wisconsin, who would write him a letter asking him to send him a pound or two pound package of oleomargarine, even if it drove into frenzied alarm all the representatives from the dairy sections of this country. If the people want oleomargarine, and if they want it colored, they are entitled to it, so long as they know what they are getting; if they are fully advised by the manufacturer as to what the article is and he has labeled it as such according to law. Section 3 of the majority bill is the important section in the bill. It is the section concerning which members began to talk here a week ago to-day, about it being a revenue measure, and it is the section about which members were talking on the following Wednesday evening, about it being a measure to repress fraud by putting on a 10-cent tax for the purpose of "taxing fraud out of oleomargarine."

Now, is not that a beautiful phrase? Will not that sound well in the valleys of southwestern Iowa and up in the valleys of Wisconsin, one of the most beautiful States in the Union, whose people are thoroughly wedded to raising dairy cows, to producing butter and cheese, "to stamp fraud out of oleomargarine."

Why, to listen to gentleman on the other side of this question, one might think that we here on this side were a band of Bulgarian brigands; that we were in a conspiracy with the gang of "adulterers," to use the language of some of the dairy papers in this country, "whose headquarters are in the city of Chicago," and that we were trying to loot the consumers of this country and sell oleomargarine as if it were butter. If that is the opinion you entertain of us, gentlemen, you are on the right path, you are proper in your methods, so that you can place it on the plane of competition where it will have no competitors to test it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. FEELY. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Whether that is our opinion of the people of Chicago or not, I desire to ask the gentleman a question on that line, whether or not the firm of which he is a member were not the attorneys in the case of The People of Illinois against M. A. Wright, and The People of Illinois against Charles R. Harrie, in 1899?

Mr. FEELY. Oh, yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. And if in the closing paragraph of the brief which you presented on behalf of the people against the oleomargarine retailer you did not use this language:

> The very vigor with which these cases are being contested by the manufacturers or mixers is evidence of the immense magnitude of the imposition now being perpetrated upon the public, for such defense would only be made to protect systematic and lucrative fraud.

Mr. FEELY. Oh, yes; that language is in that brief.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is not that the opinion you expressed in your brief?

Mr. FEELY. That is the opinion expressed in the brief that was drawn by my partner. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Wait a minute, my distinguished friend from Minnesota, before you laugh. I will admit that our firm were the attorneys, or rather my partner was the attorney, for the people in those cases; but I do not see where the materiality of the gentleman's question comes in at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. You deprecated fraud?

Mr. FEELY. I deprecated fraud there and deprecate it here; and I regret to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that his bigoted attorneyship for the farmers from Minnesota has so evidently blinded him that he supposes that I would entertain for a moment the proposition of condoning fraud there or here.

I expected that question. You know there are things in the past life of every one of you that might be dug up here on the floor and submitted to you. I suppose that the conscience of the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota, the able pioneer—I do not know whether or not he is the pioneer principe, but he is one of the pioneers of this legislation—I do not know whether his conscience would allow him to accept a retainer from one of these notorious manufacturers of oleomargarine or not. I know when I am in the law business I am there to take care of the interests of the people who retain me, just the same as when I am here I am here to legislate as I think best for the people of the United States according to my convictions on such legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, if this bill is passed by Congress a general invitation will be extended to every class to come here to the doors of this House and demand legislation beneficial to that class and destructive of every competitive class. If the lobby is strong enough, if the spies are watchful enough, if the fears of the National Legislature can be played upon strongly enough, nothing will prevent the passage of a flood of such bills as we have presented here.

There is an old principle, dear to the heart of every lover of the traditions and beliefs of the party which I love, and that is, "That government is best which governs least."

Let us pause in our mad rush to accede to the clamor for legislation, let us carefully consider every measure presented to us in this House, and let us so hold the balance that justice will be done, that freedom will be extended to all in the great field of production and trade. Let us encourage honest endeavors in honest enterprises, and let us discourage appeals to the National Government on the part of those engaged in one industry for a measure which will be destructive of the rights, occupation, and property of those engaged in another industry. Let us not turn the balance in favor of the producer and against the consumer of a necessary article of food. [Great applause.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read by the Clerk the telegram which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

LANSING, MICH., February 5, 1902.

TO CHAIRMAN MICHIGAN CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION,
Washington, D. C.

Following passed unanimously to-day at State Dairymen's Association meeting at Lansing:

"Whereas the sale of oleomargarine as butter has in the past and does in the present defraud innocent consumers and unjustly injures the legitimate business of the dairymen:

"Resolved, That the Michigan Dairymen's Association approves the bill now before Congress which taxes the sale of oleo colored to resemble pure butter, and requests our Senators and Representatives to use every effort to secure the passage of the same."

FRED M. WARNER, President.
S. J. WILSON, Secretary.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I desire simply to say a few words in addition to that telegram. The present law taxes oleomargarine 2 cents a pound. That law was passed in 1886, and is known as the "Hatch law." We propose, in the interest of the consumers of oleomargarine, to reduce the tax from 2 cents a pound to one-quarter of 1 cent a pound, and in the interests of the dairymen, the farmers, and the butter makers of this country we propose to raise the tax upon oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter to 10 cents a pound.

I believe this legislation is fully warranted. I believe that we are acting within our proper and legitimate authority. I believe that not only the dairymen but the farmers and laboring men of this country will sustain us in this matter, and therefore I desire to put myself on record in favor of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, it is not possible for me to be here when this vote will be taken to-morrow, but I desire to be upon record, and I have already been paired with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS], who would cast his vote on the other side of the question. The matter is important to the farmers of our State, and I commend this legislation to my associates here as highly necessary, and hope it will be enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I fully appreciate that every argument has been exhausted on both sides of this question, and that there remains nothing to be said, and had it not been for certain remarks made by the opposition I should not at this time offer any observations or ask to be recognized. I had the privilege of presenting my views on this subject a year ago, and I have nothing now to add, nothing to retract, and no apologies to make. But in view of the abuse, sarcasm, and the statements made by the opposition impugning the motives of the friends of this bill, I shall endeavor to answer some of the charges which have been made.

The friends of this bill now before the House have been charged with cowardice and with a lack of courage to vote their honest convictions; that we have been intimidated and solely influenced by our constituents who have been or are in the dairy business, while those on the other side occupy a more exalted plane and who claim to be infallible, spotless, pure, and clean and above suspicion, regardless of the bellowing Texas steer prodding them in the back, the cotton-seed industry of the South, the thousands of dollars employed to defeat this bill, the 5,492 fraudulent dealers in this country, the 28 oleomargarine manufacturers with all their influence and the millions of dollars back of them hammering at the doors of Congress, and so earnestly pleading that this gigantic fraud may be continued and perpetuated; and that all of these powerful influences have not appealed to their sympathy, and that they absolutely occupy and maintain an unprejudiced position, notwithstanding these inducements and influences brought to bear with so much pressure.

Oh, my friends, well might you have spared yourselves and your constituents this humiliation. You better discuss the merits and demerits of this bill rather than engage in personal insinuations and abuse. There is an old maxim that "people living in glass houses should not throw stones;" and it is a well-known fact that "self-praise bears no weight." You have my sympathy. Your abuse and energy has been all in vain. The friends of this bill are willing that it should stand upon its merits, and I trust that the opposition will consider it in this light. If so, I think there is no question as to the result.

The bill comes before you backed by a majority of the Agriculture Committee—12 to 5; by practically 5,000,000 families engaged in the dairy business, and, I believe, by a large majority of the 76,000,000 people; certainly by a large majority of the consumers of butter; at least by those who have looked into the merits of this measure, and who understand the bill.

It has the indorsement, I believe, of every food and dairy commissioner in the United States, and nearly every editor and publisher of agricultural papers. Representative men and women have appeared before our committee heartily indorsing the bill, such as Mr. Jones, representing the National Grange, an organization of thirty-five years' standing, and with subordinate branches in 40 States in the Union, a membership of more than 500,000; Mrs. Smith, representing the Women's Industrial Association; each voicing the sentiment of their respective organizations, and speaking with authority; General Grout, an exmember of this House and author of the Grout bill; exgovernor Hoard of Wisconsin; Mr. Adams, food commissioner of Wisconsin, appeared in behalf of the food commissioners of the different States; Secretary Knight, of the National Dairy Union. All of whom are persons of integrity, high standing, and representative people of this country, and who zealously and earnestly recommend the passage of this bill.

In this connection I ask the privilege of incorporating in my remarks a statement of Mr. Aaron Jones, master of the National Grange and a member of the legislative committee (p. 243, hearings of com.):

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman and gentleman, I come in here as a farmer, that having been my business all my life. I have been and am engaged in cattle farming and stock growing. I also represent the National Grange, an organization of thirty-five years' standing; an organization that has subordinate branches in 40 of the States of this Union; an organization that is thirty-five years of age. We have in membership something over 500,000 of the farmers of the United States. Our membership is composed of all classes of men engaged in agriculture—those that are engaged in dairying, those that are engaged in stock growing on a large or small scale, those who are horticulturists—in fact, the entire branch of agriculture. Our organization represents the only national organization of farmers in the United States. It is entirely nonpartisan in its organization. Our organization is established for the purpose of promoting the interests of agriculture.

This matter of the protection of the farming interests of this country we have considered from the standpoint of the best interests of the agricultural classes as well as the best interests of the citizenship of this country. We have given very much thought and attention to this protection of the dairy interests, pure foods, unadulterated foods, and the sale of commodities for what they are. We believe to-day that the best interests of the people of this country are to prohibit or prevent any of the adulteration of the food or medicine products of this country. We believe that every article ought to be put upon the market and sold for what it is, and not what it may represent in appearance. We have been decidedly from the beginning opposed to the oleomargarine people coloring their products in imitation of butter.

* * * * * * *

Three consecutive annual sessions we have been demanding of Congress the passage of a bill embracing the principles involved in this Grout bill. In 27 of the States of this Union the State granges have also indorsed the principles represented in the Grout bill. We have branches to the number of 4,000 subordinate granges, scattered in 40 States of this Union, meeting in their neighborhoods and counties, that have considered, indorsed, and urged the passage of a bill embracing the principles of the Grout bill.

We have county organizations to the number of 1,500 scattered all over this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast. I want you to understand that this membership is composed of Democrats and Republicans, and men of all shades of political opinion and all classes of the farming population. We have 1,500 of those organizations representing counties that have considered in detail this bill, and have urged and memorialized Congress for the passage of a bill embracing this principle.

Now, we believe that the farming interest—that is, the producer of 70 per cent of the wealth that goes into the channels of the trade of this country—we believe that our interest, as represented by the dairy and the cow, is a vast interest, and we believe that Congress should protect us from the adulteration or the imposition of a bogus article being palmed off on the public for the genuine article. We believe that it is injurious to the markets of this country and injures our business, and that we are entitled to protection at the hands of the Congress of the United States.

We believe that this bill embraces that protection, and with a unanimity that we have never had upon any other measure we come to Congress asking that this bill become a law, and we hope—we believe—that the justice of the members of Congress, representing the entire people, will recommend the measure that is now pending before you, for the principle involved therein. We believe that the 10-cent tax upon colored oleomargarine will give us that protection, and we hope that your committee will recommend to Congress, as unanimously as may be, such a measure, and we believe it will become—hope it will become—a law of this country, and we believe and hope that it will be enforced, with the view so that when the purchaser goes and buys he knows just exactly what he buys, so that the consumer when he goes to a hotel, and there is a thing set before him as an article of food resembling butter, will know that it is butter.

Also a statement by Charlotte Smith, president Woman's Industrial and Patriotic League, District of Columbia (p. 275, hearings).

JANUARY 22, 1902.

MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE: I will make a few brief remarks on the subject of oleomargarine. I will not quote statistics or refer to scientists' and physicians' opinions as to oleo as a pure food product. That has all been gone over by the oleo lobbyists and paid attorneys. I will, however, give a few plain facts from an independent industrial woman's standpoint, who represents the consumers of butter, butterine, etc., or more commonly speaking, "cow butter" and "steer butter."

We were threatened one day last week, Mr. Chairman, by the attorney for the oleo and cattlemen's combine, that if there was any more legislation enacted to restrict the manufacture of oleo oil, that not only a panic, but a revolution would follow. He also stated before this committee that there is $200,000,000 invested in the industry of oleo in this country.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appear before you to represent the industrial women, who are largely the purchasers as well as the consumers of butter or butterine. Women are far in excess of men in all but five States of this Union; therefore, there is a large surplus population of women over men in this country. There are nearly 4,000,000 self-supporting women who have no voice in the enacting of laws in State or national legislatures, and yet 84 per cent of all the wealth of the nation is created by women in light manufacturing industries. Notwithstanding this, they are helpless spectators looking on at unjust laws being enacted in legislative halls.

Not until man became a butter manufacturer was imitation of butter placed upon the market. Butterine was unknown to women, who are generally honest and opposed to adulterated food products.

The pretty dairy maid is a creature of the past. Man, the adulterator of food products, has usurped the place once occupied by women who made pure butter for the markets of the world. Behold the result of man's butter making. We are a nation of dyspeptics because of the poisonous compounds used and forced upon the market. There was a time in the history of our country when it was the pride of every woman to be a good housekeeper, and the farmers' daughters must be good butter makers, that they might make eligible matches. But this is all a thing of the past.

The offal of swine and steer has largely taken the place of butter upon the markets. This material, which women formerly used for the manufacture of soap, is now utilized into a so-called butter product, and backed up by paid scientists, attorneys, and lobbyists, as well as a subsidized press, and therefore the unsuspecting consumer is imposed upon by purchasing butterine in place of creamery butter made by women.

Therefore, the decline in pure butter products has also affected the matrimonial market, for matrimony has declined 60 per cent in the States of New York and Massachusetts alone by bachelors who are able to maintain and support wives and families. Thirty-two per cent of the nonmarrying men reside in the country and rural districts. I attribute this decrease in matrimony by farmers largely because women are no longer a necessary adjunct to the farmer lads to help them create wealth, owing to the existence of the oleo-cotton-oil-soap-fat combine, which has thus deprived many women and girls of legal providers and 40,000,000 people of pure cow butter in this country alone.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee on Agriculture, I solemnly protest against this "steer-butter" product as a competitor of pure butter. Greater restrictions should be placed upon the oleo combine, for the success of the combine is in deceiving the general public by substituting the butterine product for pure butter.

Also, a petition signed by editors and publishers representing 136 agricultural papers, which, I believe, includes nearly every agricultural paper of any importance in the United States. These papers have a combined circulation of 3,651,056.

PETITION FOR PASSAGE OF OLEOMARGARINE BILL.

To the Fifty-seventh Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned editors of publications devoted to agriculture, and representing the sentiments of the farmers of the United States, believing that future prosperity and welfare of the farmers of this country depends very largely upon the preservation of the dairy industry upon the farm, earnestly petition your honorable body to enact into legislation during the present session what was known in the last session as the Grout bill, which passed the House by the tremendous majority of 104, was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, and while occupying a privileged position on the Senate Calendar, failed of passage because of the rush of important appropriation bills at the close of the session

We also protest against the substitution of any other measure which in anyway eliminates the tax of 10 cents per pound on oleomargarine colored in semblance of butter, and which can not be lawfully sold in 32 States having four-fifths of the population of the United States.

Also one statement out of about 500 petitions sent me by my constituents:

NO SUBSTITUTE FOR THE GROUT BILL.

We have not authorized, and do not approve making, any change in the Grout bill as it passed the House in the Fifty-sixth Congress. So we can not indorse H. R. 4, introduced by Mr. TAWNEY. But we most heartily indorse and approve H. R. 1, introduced by Mr. MCCLEARY, which is our Grout bill word for word, and we very earnestly request you to support H. R. 1 vigorously.

While the bill under consideration is not H. R. 1, introduced by Mr. MCCLEARY, however, it is the Grout bill word for word, except with a few amendments, to which I will refer later.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a new proposition. It is a proposition that has been before the House for a quarter of a century.

Mr. BURLESON. If the gentleman will allow me right there, I wish to ask him if it is not true that in the hearing before the committee Mr. Aaron Jones, master of the National Grange, made this statement:

We have county organizations to the number of 1,500 scattered all over this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast. I want you to understand that this membership is composed of Democrats and Republicans, and men of all shades of political opinion and all classes of the farming population.

* * * * * * *

We feel so deeply upon this question that a large majority of our people will remember the position that various members representing them in the Congress of the United States will take upon it, because Congressmen represent us in their delegated capacity.

In the light of that veiled threat, replying to the gentleman's suggestion in reference to my observations, and reference to the timid, what would you say if I informed you that the statements made by me were based upon confessions made in private by members of this House, and, as I understand, some of them were members of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will leave it to the gentleman himself to make his own explanation, as well as Mr. Jones and members.

Mr. BURLESON. This is to you.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is very possible the gentleman made the statement. The fact that this gentleman makes this statement does not voice the sentiment of any member of this committee or member of this House.

But much has been said and many a slur has been thrown out to the friends of this bill, charging them with being cowards, coerced by their constituents, as well as a lack of courage to vote their honest convictions; that they who represent dairy districts dare not vote against this bill and go home to their constituents and ask for a reelection.

Let me say to you that, as much as I would like to have every member on this floor support this bill, I or any friend of this bill would not want it passed through deception. Do not for one moment suppose that your vote or any other member's vote favoring this bill will insure your or his renomination or reelection. Do not understand me to say, however, that your efforts and your honest purposes will not be appreciated by the dairy people. Most assuredly they will, for they are not an ungrateful class of people and will appreciate your efforts in securing justice and protection against fraud and deception. But it is also true that the average farmer is not a professional politician. As a rule the farmers are the most independent and industrious people we have. They are contented to look after their farms and to attend to their business and leave politics to take care of itself, except to exercise their duty and rights as citizens. And the unscrupulous corporations and individuals, through their agents, often shape and manipulate politics, conventions, etc.

My experience has been that when you fight fraud and steals you run up against the real thing. In my legislative work I have had some experience along these lines. I had the honor and pleasure of aiding in dealing the death blow to an institution in my State, organized, I believe, for no other purpose than robbery; and we felt more or less elated over the results, and of course I felt that my actions had been such as to warrant me in asking for a renomination and reelection, which I did, and had a very interesting campaign. No sooner had I returned to my home than I found agents were traveling over my district to teach those intelligent people how to vote who I suppose were capable of deciding for themselves who should represent them.

What occurred then I expect to occur again; in fact, I am not so sure but it has already been manifest.

My friends, as before stated, it is not the dairymen who are sending out agents inviting men to Congress who will do their bidding and serve their purposes; and in connection with this statement let me say to you that undoubtedly we all have in our districts men whose heart, soul, body, and brains are permeated and dominated by egotism, and whose heads are bursting with deceit and conceit, and who are naturally inclined and disposed to close their ears and bigoted eyes to everything and anything, regardless of justice and public welfare, except when their nose is glued onto a piece of trickery, jobbery, and fraud, illuminated and magnified with cold cash, and who possess a burning heart to relieve you and me.

These men are not sought by the dairy people. They are sought by the dishonest and unscrupulous corporations and individuals who have an ax to grind or something at stake, or something to ask, or that their schemes and frauds may be guarded and perpetuated; but, my friends, be not alarmed. I, in my humble efforts, have survived, and you have nothing to fear. Vote your convictions; stamp out this gigantic fraud and deception; satisfy your conscience; go to your people with a clean hand, and your rewards will be many. If not on next election day, it is sure to come, sooner or later. If not before, you will receive your reward on the day beyond; and I predict for you a place in the front ranks of those 5,000,000 dairymen in the grand march, passing through the pearly gates into a region where no oleomargarine is offered for sale, certainly not unless it is sold for what it is. And you and your posterity will have the satisfaction of you having aided in restricting and suppressing this infamous fraud and deception, and in preventing these 5,492 fraudulent dealers from thrusting 62,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine down the throats of millions of unwilling consumers every year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said, this is not a new proposition. It is a proposition which has been before Congress for a great many years. It is not a new-born babe ushered into this House; it is the same old bedfellow. It is one which has been carefully considered by the Committee on Agriculture, a committee of which I have the honor of being a member in this and the Fifty-sixth Congress. This committee in the two Congresses has given extensive hearings—yes, for days, weeks, and months—and have given it the most careful consideration.

It is one that has received earnest consideration by the American people; one that has been thoroughly discussed, and I believe it meets with the approval of 90 per cent of our citizens. There is no question in my mind but that it meets with the approval of 99 per cent of the butter consumers of this country, and certainly by those who understand this bill. It is true, my friends, that this bill comes here backed by the 5,000,000 manufacturers of butter, as shown by the thousands of petitioners.

It is true that Mr. Jones appeared before us as the representative of the National Grange, speaking with the authority of this organization, an organization of thirty-five years' standing, with subordinate branches in 40 States in the Union, and with a membership of 500,000 people. Mrs. Smith appeared before that committee and spoke with authority for the National Women's Industrial Association of the United States, voicing its sentiment. One hundred and thirty-six editors and publishers, including nearly every agricultural paper of any prominence in this country, with a combined circulation of 3,651,000, have petitioned for its passage.

This bill was reported by the Committee on Agriculture a year ago, by a majority report. It was made a special order in this House, and passed by a two-thirds majority, and I trust and believe that a large majority of this House will give it their hearty and loyal support.

Mr. BURLESON. Will my friend permit me?

Mr. HAUGEN. Let me finish my statement. So, my friends, the bill is here; it is here with a record, and it is here with friends to back it, though it has some foes.

Mr. BURLESON. We all know that. Now will you permit me?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have only an hour.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like you to answer one short question.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will answer any question.

Mr. BURLESON. And you can answer it yes or no. Did a single person appear before the Committee on Agriculture demanding the enactment of this bill who spoke for the consumers of oleomargarine? That can be answered yes or no.

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, I am not sure whether anybody appeared before the committee directly for the consumer of oleomargarine. I could not answer that question at this time.

Mr. BURLESON. As a matter of fact, they did not.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mrs. smith and Mr. Jones voiced the sentiments of those people, and I believe they knew the facts. Mrs. Smith stated that the people whom she represented were consumers of butter, and that she was. However, this is immaterial. The purpose of this bill is to suppress fraud.

The friends of this measure charge oleomargarine with fraud, deception, and imposition—a charge which no man on this floor or elsewhere will, can, or dare deny. Even the eminent gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], whom every man on this floor respects for his integrity, sound judgment, and profound wisdom, has admitted that fraud is being perpetrated all over the land, but only by the so-called dishonest farmers who buy oleo and sell it for butter. Well might he have added 1,005 dealers in his own State, selling 8,830,960 pounds of oleomargarine made in imitation of butter, sold in 1899, every pound of it in violation of the laws of his own State. Well might he have added 2,020 dealers in the State of Illinois, selling 18,638,921 pounds of this same counterfeit.

Well might he have added three dealers selling 79,000 pounds in my own State, and well might he have added 5,492 dealers selling 62,825,582 pounds of yellow oleomargarine in the United States contrary to the laws of the several States, for the gentleman well knows that 32 States, representing, according to the Federal census of 1890, a population of 50,117,440, or about five-sixths of the total population of the United States, have enacted laws absolutely prohibiting the sale of yellow oleomargarine. Yet we find, according to Secretary Gage's report in response to a resolution passed by this House the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, that 5,492 dealers were engaged in the selling of this counterfeit, and that in violation of the laws. According to Secretary Gage's report during the fiscal year ending June, 1899, 62,825,582 pounds of yellow oleomargarine made in semblance of butter was sold by the 5,492 dealers in these 32 States, while 1,501 dealers sold only 16,860,141 pounds in the remaining 20 States and Territories.

Well did the gentleman from Ohio know that the sale of oleomargarine in Ohio is permitted only when free from coloring matter or other ingredients to cause it to look like butter and made in such form and sold in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character, and that the 8,830,969 pounds of yellow oleomargarine sold by the 1,005 dealers in his State in 1899 was sold contrary to the laws of his State.

In my State we have a drastic law absolutely prohibiting the coloring of imitation butter or cheese. It provides "that every package shall be plainly marked 'Substitute for butter' or 'Substitute for cheese,' and each sale shall be accompanied by a verbal notice and a printed statement that the article is an imitation, * * * giving the address of the maker; and that the use of these imitations in hotels, bakeries, etc., must be made known by signs. Nevertheless, as shown by Secretary Gage's report, I find that three dealers sold 79,922 pounds of yellow oleomargarine in the year 1899 in my own State, every pound of it sold in violation of the law; and every pound thus sold displaced a pound of butter and robbed the dairy producer of his legitimate market.

In the State of Wisconsin, notwithstanding the law prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine made in imitation of butter, and permitting the sale of oleomargarine only when it is free from color or other ingredients to make it look like butter, we find 23 dealers selling 714,743 pounds of yellow oleomargarine in violation of the laws of that State; and so on until you find 5,492 dealers selling more than 62,000,000 pounds of yellow oleomargarine in the 32 States which have enacted laws prohibiting its sale; and this out of a total product of only 83,000,000 pounds. Hence we find that six-eighths of the total produce was sold in violation of the laws of the States. Well did these distinguished gentlemen from the State of Illinois, who have so strenuously opposed this measure, know that the laws of their State provides that imitation butter shall not be colored to resemble butter; and well did they know that these 2,020 dealers sold 18,000,000 pounds notwithstanding their State laws. So there can be no doubt but that gross fraud and deception is and has been perpetrated. This, however, is generally conceded, and the only question is as to the percentage of fraud. I hold that 75 to 90 per cent of the product of oleomargarine is sold in open violation of the law; sold for pure butter, at butter prices, and consumed as butter.

The question was asked yesterday, "What is the attitude of the laborers toward this bill?" My answer is that the laborers, yes, the men who earn their bread by the sweat of their brows, are entitled to protection against fraud, deception, and imposition, and are entitled to as good butter as anybody, and they have as much right and interest in this bill as anyone, as they are the ones who are generally imposed upon through its fraudulent sale. The wealthy families and first-class hotels as a rule do not buy their butter directly from these unscrupulous dealers, but buy directly of the fancy creameries or their agents, and exercise precaution in buying and in securing pure butter, while the laborer buys from the retail dealer, who palms off this counterfeit for butter and at butter prices.

And I venture the assertion, without fear of successful contradiction, that 75 per cent of the 8,000,000 pounds sold in Ohio and the 18,000,000 pounds sold in Illinois was sold to the laborers in those States. No, it is not the laborers who would be benefited by you encouraging and bolstering up this gigantic fraud; it is the pockets of the unlawful and unscrupulous dealers throughout the country.

Much has been said as to the State of Illinois. It has been alleged that in that State—in the city of Chicago more particularly—that the State laws are being violated and that colored oleomargarine is sold in defiance of the law. To satisfy myself, upon my trip home during the holiday recess I stopped off at the city of Chicago with the view of ascertaining whether or not this were true.

I went from place to place where butter was supposed to be sold inquiring for pure butter. In most cases I inquired for the best creamery butter, and purchased some 20 pounds in the 20 different places. I had some doubt whether or not these were the genuine article, not that I had any reasons to believe that the authorities of the State of Illinois were negligent in enforcing the laws, but upon investigation I found that creamery butter was selling wholesale at 25 cents, and found that the retail dealers advertised and sold what they called the very best creamery butter for 22 to 24 cents per pound, or about 2 cents per pound less than the actual cost of butter. To make it an absolute certainty, upon my return to Washington I sent a part of 10 packages to Dr. H. W. Wiley, chief chemist of the Agricultural Department, requesting him to make an analysis of the samples supposed to be butter; and I hold in my hand the report giving the results of his analysis, which I wish to have incorporated in my remarks.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY, OFFICE OF THE CHIEF,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1902.

Hon. G. N. HAUGEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In harmony with your request of the 9th instant, I have made an examination of the samples of supposed butter which you sent, marked 1 to 10, inclusive. The analytical data obtained are as follows:

Number.	Water.	Fat.	Curd.	Ash.	Reichert-Meissl number.	Refractive index at 25°.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
1	11.12	84.96	1.56	2.36	2.54	57
2	8.20	88.11	.81	2.88	2.25	59.4
3	11.97	82.93	1.04	4.06	2.76	56.3
4	9.85	85.08	2.11	2.96	1.78	55.5
5	12.25	83.56	1.31	2.88	3.25	56.9
6	11.62	84.51	1.02	2.85	2.65	57.2
7	11.25	84.46	1.37	2.92	5.06	56
8	11.55	84.37	.90	3.18	4.08	55.9
9	9.79	87.14	1	2.07	1.44	59.3
10	10.54	85.55	1.25	2.66	2	53.8

From the above data it is seen that every one of these samples is oleomargarine. Nos. 5, 7, and 8 have a considerable percentage of genuine butter, probably from 10 to 20 per cent. Under the column per cent of ash is given the mineral matter present in the samples, nearly all of which is common salt. The percentage of water is about that of normal butter prepared in the best manner for the market. All of the samples were colored with a yellow coal-tar dye.

Trusting that the above data will prove satisfactory, I am,
Respectfully,

H. W. WILEY, Chief.

This investigation and analysis discloses the fact that every pound of these 10 samples was oleomargarine. No. 5, 7, and 8 have a considerable percentage of genuine butter, probably from 10 to 20 per cent. All of the samples were colored with a yellow coal-tar dye.

Mark you, the State of Illinois has upon its statute books a law prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine made in semblance of yellow butter. Every pound of these packages was purchased for pure butter. Every pound sold in violation of the law; every pound displaced a pound of butter. And there is and can be no question but that every one of the 20 packages purchased by me in the city of Chicago was oleomargarine and not butter, or that which it was sold for. What is true of these 20 dealers whom I called upon I take it is also true of every other dealer in the city, as well as a large number of dealers in other parts of the State and in other States of the Union.

In addition to this, I wish to read to you from a letter from a retail dealer's clerk in Chicago to the secretary of the National Dairy Union:

During the past twenty-two years I think I have worked in nearly every first-class grocery in Chicago, and I can truthfully say that eight out of every ten have been and are still selling butterine for pure butter. I recently was employed in one of the largest groceries and markets on one of the most prominent streets of the city. During the time I was employed there we never sold one pound of butter, for we never had it in the house to sell. We clerks would talk among ourselves about it, and would often compare notes with other clerks, and to satisfy myself I made quite a canvass of all the stores in the mile and found not one that did not impose on its trade.

This man was in a position to know of what he spoke, and in view of what I know of the situation I have no doubt but what every word of it is true. Let me read to you extracts from letters sent out from the manufacturers of oleomargarine to their retail dealers. I read to you a letter signed and sent out by William J. Moxley, Chicago, one of the largest manufacturers of oleo in the United States, under date of August 2, 1899. First, the letter calls the retail dealer's attention to two circular letters sent out by Hugh V. Murray, an attorney for Illinois Dairy Union, and one by C. Y. Knight, a gentleman who is well known by a large number of us, one who has persistently, earnestly, and effectively labored for the dairy interests of this country and to whom much credit is due. Mr. Moxley, after paying his compliments to these gentlemen, makes this statement:

With the hired attorney, who is earning his fee, we have nothing to say, only to inform you that these gentlemen are trying to ring in a bluff. You will notice in their circulars that by insinuations they would have people believe they represent some official authority. The Internal-Revenue Department looks after their own business and the State after theirs, and should this so-called dairy union interfere with your business in the way of prosecution as to the State laws, we hereby guarantee you protection to the extent of paying all fines, costs, etc., until the color law is decided unconstitutional in the supreme court of the State of Illinois, and will further, on receiving complaint, take such action for damages as will make it unpleasant for some of those who are attempting to interfere with your and our own legitimate business.

* * * * * * *

We strongly recommend you to pay no attention to those circulars. We have always been in a position to protect our customers from injustice and blackmailers, and will be ever at your service should you require our aid.

Respectfully, yours,

WM. J. MOXLEY.

Braun & Fitts sent out the following letter at about the same time:

Every licensed butterine dealer in Chicago has received circular letters from the secretary and attorney for the Illinois Dairy Union, promising all sorts of trouble to dealers in butterine (that honest and pure article of food). Well, now, don't you believe a word of it. There is a law against blackmailing, and we want now and here to go on record to the assertion, as an affidavit, that we shall civilly and criminally prosecute any man or party of men interfering unlawfully with the butterine business in this or any other State. We know exactly where we stand: we are properly advised on the subject, and now we make you a "fair offer:" "Handle our goods as you always have; we in turn promise and guarantee full protection against the State law (which has been declared unconstitutional) to the extent of paying cost of prosecution, fines, and paying all costs pertaining thereto." In declaring the law unconstitutional, one of the judges stated to the effect "that the butter ring were, in his opinion, liable to prosecution to recover damages done an honest industry." Fair enough, isn't it? Renew your efforts, and be assured that we will be prepared to fight any number of rounds in any kind of a legal fight to the finish. Handle our butterine and be safe.

I wish to call your especial attention to these statements:

Should the so-called dairy union interfere with your business in the way of prosecution as to the State laws, we hereby guarantee you protection to the extent of paying all fines, costs, etc.

And the statement made by Braum & Fitts:

We know exactly where we stand. We are properly advised on the subject; and now we make you a fair offer: Handle our goods as you always have; we, in turn, promise and guarantee you protection against the State laws (which has been declared unconstitutional) to the extent of paying costs of prosecution, fines, and paying all costs pertaining thereto.

And their statement:

Renew your efforts and be assured we will be prepared for any number of rounds in any kind of legal fight to the finish. Handle our butterine and be safe.

This needs no explanation. Is this not an encouragement from the manufacturer to the dealer to induce the dealers to sell the counterfeit? The language used is broad and clear. The guaranty is absolute, and there can be no question as to the intent on the part of the manufacturer. I also read to you from a copy of a circular issued by Mr. Moxley under date of April 15, 1899.

CHICAGO, April 5, 1899.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE.

Inclosed find a color card, which is as near the color of our butterine as the printer's art can represent. Our aim in sending you this card is to aid you in selecting the proper color suitable to your trade. Mistakes are easily made, but hard to remedy.

In nearly every section of the country there is a difference in the color of butter, and even in certain seasons of the year there is a change, as you will have noticed. In winter butter is of a lighter color than in summer. In many sections this is the result of the difference in feed or pasture.

We can give you just what you want at all seasons if we know your requirements. As an example, No. 1 has no coloring matter, No. 2 a little coloring, and so on to No. 8, which is the highest-colored goods we turn out. Preserve this card, order the color you want by number, and we will send you just what you want.

Yours, truly, W. J. MOXLEY.

The language used in this circular letter is explicit, and there can be no doubt as to its meaning.

Notwithstanding these startling facts, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, after his elaborate remarks in opposition to this bill, asked the question, "How much of this oleomargarine is sold in violation of the law?" If he will take the trouble to ascertain the facts he will find that 99 out of every 100 dealers in Chicago are to-day selling and have for years sold oleomargarine and nothing but oleomargarine, all being sold for pure butter; and it is a positive fact that a pound of pure butter can hardly be purchased in that city. In view of the fact that fraud and deception is being perpetrated, and in view of this report, made by Chief Chemist Wiley, containing analytical data of oleomargarine bought for butter, and which discloses the fact that every pound of it was oleomargarine and every pound was colored in imitation of butter——

Mr. BURLESON. It took an expert chemist to decide it.

Mr. HAUGEN. It did not; I knew it was oleomargarine.

Mr. TAWNEY. It takes an expert to determine counterfeit money.

Mr. HAUGEN. Now, every pound of that was bought by me as pure butter, and every pound sold was sold for pure butter, and every pound displaced a pound of butter and robs the legitimate consumer or producer of butter of his market. Now, what is true of these 10 packages I hold is true of the 22 packages, and what is possible in the city of Chicago is also possible in the State of Illinois, and what is true as to the State of Illinois is true in every State in the Union.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. SNODGRASS. You speak of having purchased oleomargarine when you called for butter. Does the gentleman believe that if the substitute bill should become a law that would be possible?

Mr. HAUGEN. That would open the way for fraud in every State in the Union, notwithstanding the laws of the State. If it is the purpose of this House to open the gate to wholesale fraud and deception, then I say let my friends adopt this substitute. But if it is proposed by this House that this fraud should be restricted and suppressed, then I say vote for the majority bill.

Mr. SNODGRASS. The gentleman does not believe that if Congress should pass a law requiring the retail dealer to sell oleomargarine with the name stamped into the product, with the stamp on the outside of the package——

Mr. HAUGEN. My friend knows that there is nothing in the substitute bill that would prevent the hotel keeper or the restaurant keeper——

Mr. SNODGRASS. I say with the name stamped into the product and with the revenue stamp on the outside of it——

Mr. HAUGEN. I wish to state to the gentleman that I have only one hour of time. I wish to say that there is nothing in the substitute to hinder any hotel keeper or any restaurant keeper shaving off the word "oleomargarine" impressed in the article and serving it to his boarders for pure butter. The gentleman knows that the largest portion of the article is disposed of in that way.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman state whether or not, in his opinion, it will prevent the retail dealer from practicing such frauds as was practiced upon him?

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, possibly it might, but it is safer to leave these matters to the several States of the Union.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I think so, too, and after the disposition of it to the retail dealer we will leave it to the States.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. HAUGEN. Very well.

Mr. SIMS. What did the gentleman pay for the 22 pounds of butter, buying it a pound at a time?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is how I knew it was oleomargarine. I found butter that day was selling at wholesale for 25 cents a pound. I found dealers advertising and offering to sell the best creamery butter for 23 and 24 cents a pound. Oleomargarine sold then for about 1 or 2 cents less than the actual cost of butter, and there was one thing certain, and that was that the product was counterfeit.

Mr. SIMS. Then the gentleman was not fooled; he knew it by the price. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAUGEN. I had a grave suspicion. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. In the 22 places that the gentlemen went did they not offer to sell him real creamery butter?

Mr. HAUGEN. They offered to sell me real creamery butter, and claimed this was real creamery butter, but every pound of it was oleomargarine.

Mr. SIMS. Was that the best they had?

Mr. HAUGEN. I called for the best they had. It is an absolute fact that it is almost impossible to buy a pound of butter in the city of Chicago. Ninety-nine times out of one hundred they sell oleomargarine for butter.

Mr. SIMS. They seem to like it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Eighteen million pounds of it is crammed down the throats of the people there, and the most of them are unwilling consumers.

Mr. MONDELL. It is practically impossible for a person to distinguish between oleomargarine and butter, as I understand.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think so; that is, when oleomargarine is made and colored in imitation of butter. A counterfeit greenback may be so made as to be almost undistinguishable from a genuine note.

Mr. MONDELL. It seems to me a rather extraordinary figure of speech for the gentleman to say that a great deal of oleomargarine is crammed down the unwilling throats of the American people.

Mr. HAUGEN. They buy what they suppose to be butter, and they receive oleomargarine. They do not receive what they call for.

Mr. FLEMING. Allow me to ask whether the price of dairy butter on the market has gone up or down since this bill was before the House the last time?

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, the price of butter is going up and down every year; I can not answer that question.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not higher now than it was a year ago?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly, and it ought to be; everything else is higher now.

But, Mr. Chairman, this violation of law is not confined to the State of Illinois alone. Take the great State of Wisconsin, a State which is so ably represented upon this floor, and which is so ably represented upon our committee in the person of Mr. DAHLE, a gentleman of large experience and practical knowledge of affairs, who has given this subject his untiring energy, thought, and attention, and to whom much credit is due in behalf of this legislation—a great State where, we are told, the law is being enforced as well as it can be by human beings, and where the matter of enforcing the law is not in the hands of officers who are negligent in their duties, and where they have no corrupt courts. I had occasion to visit Milwaukee and Racine, and while there I purchased a few pounds of oleomargarine. Upon my return I sent four of those packages to the same chief chemist with a request that he analyze the packages and report—a report which I hold in my hands and which I ask to have incorporated in my remarks.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY, OFFICE OF THE CHIEF,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1902.

DEAR SIR: In harmony with your request of the 9th instant, I have made an examination of the samples of supposed butter received from you labeled 1R, 2R, 3R, and 4R. The analytical data follow:

	1R.	2R.	3R.	4R.
Per cent of water	7.95	9.87	5.76	13.32
Per cent of fat	85.19	85.26	90.66	82.61
Per cent of curd	1.19	.91	.84	1.75
Per cent of ash	5.67	3.96	2.74	2.32
Reichert-Meiss No	2	1.05	28.50	2
Refractive index at 25°	60.5	61.8	50.6	56.9

From the above data, it is seen that only one of the samples, viz, 3R, is genuine butter; all the others are oleomargarine. In regard to coloring matter, all are colored with a yellow coal-tar dye; 3R, however, has only a slight amount of coloring matter. The other samples are all heavily colored. Under the head of ash is given the mineral constituents of these samples, almost all of which is common salt.

Trusting that you will find the above data satisfactory, I am,
Respectfully,

H. W. WILEY, Chief.

Hon. G. N. HAUGEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I find, according to this report made by Mr. Wiley, that 3 out of those 4 pounds were oleomargarine—every pound colored in imitation of butter, and a deep color at that—every pound sold in violation of the law.

So the question is not before this House whether a fraud is or is not being perpetrated. The question is as to the percentage of fraud, and the percentage can be no less than 80, and in some instances it may exceed 99 per cent.

Now, a word as to its ingredients and whether or not oleomargarine is a wholesome, palatable, and a nutritious article. I am not a chemist, and do not care to express an opinion upon this subject, but I will incorporate in my remarks extracts from Governor Hoard's statement made before our committee. Governor Hoard is a gentleman of large experience, a practical man, broad and fair minded, absolutely reliable, and one whose integrity and judgment can not be questioned.

Dr. Schweinitz, of the Agricultural Department, in making an inspection of oleomargarine factories and abattoirs several years ago, told the secretary of the dairy union that he saw a pile of restaurant and meat-market refuse upon the floor of an oleomargarine factory then located in Pennsylvania, and that he was informed by those in charge that the better quality of this refuse fat was used for oleomargarine and the remainder for soap grease. J. S. Iglehart, Baltimore's superintendent of street cleaning, in an interview published in the Baltimore American August 17, 1900, is reported as follows, in connection with a tour he had made in search of a plant for the proper disposition of Baltimore's garbage.

"Mr. Iglehart further explained that many of the garbage contractors in other cities made a profit out of the refuse by separating the oil, etc., from the garbage. In addition to the oil, which is always marketable at fair prices, there is a lot of fertilizing material in the general product of the plant. 'One man in the West told me that he knew of an instance where butterine was made from the oil that was extracted from the product of his plant,' said the commissioner. 'I did not see any of the butterine, and do not believe that I would very much relish it if I knew that it was made from street garbage, but I was told that it was an absolutely pure article of food, and quite popular. It was, of course, sold as butterine, and I doubt very much whether the purchasers knew anything of its origin; otherwise I do not believe that it would be so popular.

"'Another contractor showed me a jug containing some of the water that had been extracted from the refuse. It was the purest looking water I ever saw, but I did not care to drink any of it. The gentleman told me that he was conducting an experiment. I took his word for it and begged off from sampling the stuff. Every time I ate butter or drank water in that city I thought I was tasting garbage.'"

It has been frequently charged that the fat from horse butcheries is made up into oleo oil, and also that fats taken from animals which have died a natural death of disease have also been so utilized.

While we have not spent time and money seeking evidence of these things for the reasons stated, I desire to lay before you for your own mature consideration the fact that in no other way can we account for the production of the amount of oleo oil that is consumed and exported in this country. During the fiscal year of 1899-1900 there were, according to the Treasury Department reports, 142,000,000 pounds of oleo oil exported from this country. The same Department shows that in the same year 24,000,000 pounds were used in the manufacture of oleomargarine in this country. This is a total supply of 166,000,000 pounds for the year.

Now, where did this come from? How much oleo oil do cattle make per head?

The statement made before the Senate Committee on Agriculture in 1886 by Elmer E. Washburn, a live-stock dealer in Chicago, showed that from 148,893 head of cattle slaughtered in that city by one of the largest packing concerns there was an average of 61.5 pounds of fat in those animals used in oleo oil, and that those 61.5 pounds made 28.1 pounds of oleo oil, which goes to prove that there is less than 1 pound of oleo oil to 2 pounds of fat. If there were 28.1 pounds of oleo in each of the 5,000,000 head of cattle slaughtered in this country during the same year, this would account for only 140,000,000 of the 166,000,000 pounds in sight. This leaves 24,000,000 pounds to be accounted for. But the oleo people, in all their declarations to Congress and manifestoes to the public, claim that only the finest caul fat of the steer is used in the manufacture of oleomargarine. Experiments made by our present Secretary of Agriculture while dean of agriculture of the Iowa College showed that in 30 steers averaging in weight 1,508 pounds there was an average of but 37.66 pounds of caul fat.

As it is well known that 1,200 pounds would be a heavy average for the general run of animals marketed, there would not be found more than an average of 30 pounds of caul fat in each. As Mr. Washburn's testimony is that it takes more than 2 pounds of raw fat to make 1 pound of oleo oil, it is plain that the average animal will not produce more than 15 pounds of oleo oil from its caul fat. At this rate we can account for but 75,000,000 of the 166,000,000 pounds of oleo oil that makes its appearance upon the market.

These figures have been placed before the oleomargarine makers and they challenged to show the origin of this extra oleo oil. They have never made any attempt to show us how they get 166,000,000 pounds of oleo oil out of 5,000,000 head of cattle. We are bound to presume, therefore, that they have recourse to some source of supply regarding which they do not care to take the public into their confidence.

Mr. ALLEN. You say that there is no reason why this should not be so. Then how do you account for the balance of the oleomargarine of the country?

Mr. HOARD. In my opinion, it is made from the refuse fats.

Mr. ALLEN. Where do these refuse fats come from?

Mr. HOARD. From dead animals and from all sorts of sources.

Mr. ALLEN. How much do you estimate the 5,000,000 head of cattle will produce of the oleo proper?

Mr. HOARD. One hundred and forty million pounds; but I am speaking in these last figures of the caul fats. Oleo oil is made entirely from caul fat, and caul fat is only one portion of the fat of the animal.

The CHAIRMAN. How many pounds do you figure out is made from refuse matter?

Mr. HOARD. The difference is about 24,000,000 pounds.

This is provided that the statement of the oleo manufacturers is true, that they make it only from caul fat.

Mr. MOODY. Now, if they make it from caul fat you leave it to inference where the other comes from, whether it is from the garbage wagon or where?

Mr. HOARD. Yes; I leave it to inference.

Also a statement of Hugh Reed, foreman of one of the departments of public printing, and whose trustworthiness was vouched for by one of the honored members of this House a year ago, a statement which appeared in the Evening Star May 10, 1900, in an interview given in response to the question, "Is it true that all kinds of fat are used in Chicago to make oleo oil, which is made into oleomargarine?" Reed replied:

I know positively that this is true. I was one of the few who in workmen's clothes was permitted to go through some of the establishments where oleo oil is made in that city. There was one place, at the corner of Archer avenue and ——— street (he gave its name), where the scraps from the restaurants and hotels of Chicago were taken by their ten collectors with wagons for the purpose every day. I have been right in this place and seen these scraps of fat put through the processes that bring them finally into the bags in the presses where the oil is pressed out of them.

The scraps from these restaurants and hotels are divided into two classes—one from which the oleo oil is made, the other going into soap. Not only that, but this same establishment purchased the fat from the horse butchery out on the Brighton road, which fat was used in the same manner as the scraps from the hotels and restaurants. And what I saw with my own eyes at this place is well known to the employees and workingmen in that neighborhood, and the subject of common discussion throughout that locality. I have a close relative employed in one of these concerns right now, and he knows all about the business from a to z.

Dr. De Schweinitz, of the Agricultural Department, in his visit to a factory which was several years ago located in Philadelphia, found the same condition of affairs. Oleo oil was being made from a pile of fat scraps collected from the hotels, restaurants, and butcher shops, which pile gave out such an odor that it was sickening, and the makers admitted it was being made into oleomargarine. The same thing was found by a reporter of the Newark Advertiser early in January of this year, when he stumbled onto a rendering establishment near that city that was doing the same thing.

But it is easy to prove by statistics which are indisputable that every kind of fat and scraps are being used in the manufacture of oleo oil, which goes later into oleomargarine. The makers of oleomargarine claim that the carcasses from which their fats are taken "are killed under the supervision of the Government," hence perfectly wholesome and healthful. This is their strong argument—"all oleomargarine made under the supervision of the Government."

Now a word as to the word "yellow;" whether or not the so-called "Grout bill" shall be amended by inserting the words "yellow butter" in place of the word "butter." As to this proposition there has been some difference of opinion among the dairy people. In my opinion this is a dangerous word to use. If it should go into the bill it seems to me it would open the gate to wholesale fraud and deception. By inserting this word we fix a standard by which manufacturers and dealers may color their substitute. If we use the phrase "made in imitation of butter" it covers all shades of butter which are yellow, varying according to the different seasons and the feed given the cow, and there can be no question and nothing to quiver over by any jury or court. And in the light of experience this seems to be a dangerous word to use. In the State of Illinois, where they have enacted a law prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine made in semblance of yellow butter, we find from Chemist Wiley's and Secretary Gage's reports that they are selling colored oleomargarine under this law.

We also find the same thing existing in the State of Wisconsin, a State which also prohibits the sale of oleomargarine made in semblance of yellow butter. Notwithstanding, the colored oleomargarine is being sold in that State, as is shown by Secretary Gage's report, and this report made by Mr. Wiley, which shows that of the four packages purchased by me in Racine and Wisconsin, only one was genuine butter, all the others were oleomargarine and all were colored with a yellow coal-tar dye; and, mark you, colored very heavy at that. If it is possible for the oleomargarine dealer to sell his colored oleomargarine in the States of Illinois and Wisconsin under the drastic laws enacted in those States (and there is no question but that the laws are being daily and openly violated in all the cities and all of the towns of any considerable size in these two States), it is also possible for every State that has enacted similar laws prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine made to imitate yellow butter.

In the light of the experience we have had in the State of Wisconsin, I was very much surprised to learn that the idea of amending this bill and inserting the word "yellow" and the idea of removing the entire tax on uncolored oleomargarine originated with the food commissioner representing that great dairy State, and where the oleomargarine laws are so grossly violated. And in view of the stubborn fight made by the opposition in our committee for retaining this word in the bill, I am free to say that I look upon this word with suspicion; but in view of the difference of opinion among the friends of the bill, I am willing to yield to their judgment and will give the bill my hearty support, even if so amended.

Now, a word as to the bill. Section 1 provides:

A bill to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine.

Be it enacted, etc., That all articles known as oleomargarine, butterine, imitation butter, or imitation cheese, or any substance in the semblance of butter or cheese not the usual product of the dairy and not made exclusively of pure and unadulterated milk or cream, transported into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon the arrival within the limits of such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such articles or substances had been produced in such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to permit any State to forbid the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in a separate and distinct form and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like yellow butter.

Section 1 gives the several States authority over oleomargarine—that is, when oleomargarine is transported into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall, upon arrival within the limits of such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such article or substitute had been produced in the State. This section does away with the effect of what is known as the "original-package law," and, as interpreted in the case of "Leisy v. Hardin," where it was held by the Supreme Court that a carload of beer in cans, which was shipped from the State of Illinois into the State of Iowa, could be sold by the shipper or consignee in the State of Iowa in the unbroken "original packages" notwithstanding the laws of Iowa, which prohibited the sale of beer and making it a criminal offense to sell.

The courts have held that in the absence of Congressional permission to do so the State had no power to interfere by seizure or any other action in prohibition of importation and sale by the foreign or nonresident importers. In view of these decisions, it was thought best to enact into law the principles laid down in the so-called "Wilson bill," which provided that intoxicating liquors became subject to the local laws when they were shipped into any State or Territory, and which has been sustained by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts (155 U. S., 462), in the Justice Harlan decision. It was held in this decision by the Supreme Court that oleomargarine colored in imitation of yellow butter and shipped into Massachusetts, a State which had a statute preventing absolutely the manufacture and sale of oleo shipped into this State from another State, became subject to the laws of Massachusetts on its arrival in the State, but permitting the manufacture and sale of oleo free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like butter, and not in conflict with the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, where the laws of Massachusetts permitted the manufacture and sale of oleo free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like butter.

Or, in other words, the first section provides that when the counterfeit substitute is taken into a State or Territory it shall be subject to the laws of the States and Territories concerning such substitute.

This section is identical with the first section of the "Grout bill," which passed the House in the last Congress. There can be no objection to this section; it seems absolutely fair and safe to leave the regulation as to manufacture and sale of this article to the several States.

SEC. 2. That the first clause of section 3 of an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," be amended by adding thereto, after the word "oleomargarine," at the end of said clause, the following words:

"And any person that sells, vends, or furnishes oleomargarine for the use and consumption of others, except to his own family and guests thereof, without compensation, who shall add to or mix with such oleomargarine any ingredient or coloration that causes it to look like butter, shall also be held to be a manufacturer of oleomargarine within the meaning of said act and subject to the provisions thereof."

This section defines the manufacturer. The committee, upon investigation, and visiting establishments where oleomargarine was made, found that oleomargarine could be colored after it had been made. It was generally supposed that in order to color oleomargarine it would be necessary to melt it; but upon investigation we found that it was not necessary to melt it, and that it could be colored simply by working it over by hand, or running it through a cylinder, or a machine made for that purpose, and that the coloring could be added without much difficulty. To prevent this coloring after manufacture, either by retail dealers, wholesale dealers, or hotel or restaurant keepers, the committee recommends this amendment to the original Grout bill. And I think there can be no question with the friends of this bill as to the necessity of inserting this section:

SEC. 3. That on and after July 1, 1902, the tax upon oleomargarine, as prescribed in section 8 of the act approved August 2, 1886, and entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," shall be one-fourth of 1 cent per pound when the same is not made in imitation of butter; but when made in imitation of butter, the tax to be paid by the manufacturer shall be 10 cents per pound, to be levied and collected in accordance with the provisions of said act.

Section 3 reduces the tax from 2 cents to ¼ cent per pound on oleomargarine when the same is not made in imitation of butter, and increases the tax from 2 to 10 cents per pound when made in imitation of butter. This bill does not increase the cost of oleomargarine by imposing an additional or burdensome tax. It reduces the tax 1¾ cents per pound on oleomargarine not made in semblance of butter, thus reducing the cost except where it is made in semblance of butter, so that the poor man or the laborer whom you have spoken of may buy the genuine article—oleomargarine—at a reduced price, and if he proposes to color it for his own use, his family or guests, he is permitted to do so under the bill, and which can readily be done without any expense or inconvenience. But when the article is colored to deceive, the additional tax is added.

This section amended, as recommended by the committee, in striking out the word "yellow," to which I have already referred, is verbatim that of the Grout bill; and in this section we come to the bone of contention. Pure butter to-day selling at from 23 to 35 cents per pound; oleomargarine selling for from 10 to 12 cents per pound; that is, when it is sold for what it is—a difference of from 11 to 23 cents per pound in the cost of the two articles—is an incentive to the dealer to palm off the cheaper article for the more costly one. With the manufacturers at his back offering to defend him in the courts and pay the fines if convicted, and the enormous profit, the temptations overcome the dealers, the laws are violated, and gross fraud is being perpetrated all over this whole country. The consumer buys this counterfeit at butter prices, and eats it as pure butter, being both deceived and imposed upon by the unscrupulous dealers. By increasing the tax 8 cents per pound on oleomargarine made in imitation of butter, the incentive for fraud is removed; if not in full, at least in part.

SEC. 4. That wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall keep such books and render such returns in relation thereto as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may, by regulation, require; and such books shall be open at all times to the inspection of any internal-revenue officer or agent. And any person who willfully violates any of the provisions of this section shall for each such offense be fined not less than $50 and not exceeding $500 and imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than six months.

Section 4 is verbatim the act of 1896, except the penalty clause, and nobody doubts the advisability and necessity of this amendment.

Another suggestion and I am done. In the United States we have more than 5,000,000 families engaged in the dairy business, producing more than 2,000,000,000 pounds of butter, valued at more than $500,000,000. In the State of Iowa we had a year ago 994 creameries, with an average investment of $3,000 each, making a total investment of $2,982,000; while there were in the United States at that time 26 oleomargarine manufacturing plants, with an estimated average investment (based upon mercantile agencies' reports) of $25,000, or a total of $650,000. Since then two have been added, and if the same average investment applies to these two factories we have at this time a total investment of $700,000 in oleomargarine manufacturing establishments, which would be less than one-quarter of the amount of money invested in creameries in the State of Iowa alone. However, I understand that the amount invested is much greater now, and probably equals the amount invested in creameries in Iowa.

Thirty-two States, with a population, according to the Federal census of 1890, of more than 50,000,000 people (now more than 60,000,000), or about five-sixths of the total population of the United States, have laws absolutely prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine; yet we find 5,492 dealers selling 62,852,582 pounds of yellow oleo in those 32 States, out of a total product of 83,000,000 pounds, while 1,501 dealers sold 16,860,140 pounds in the remaining States and Territories. The manufacture and sale of oleo has grown from the insignificant sum of 21,513,537 in 1888 to 83,000,000 pounds in 1899, and to the enormous sum of 107,045,028 in 1900, and about 104,000,000 in 1901, a gain of about 500 per cent in twelve years. Seventy-five per cent of this counterfeit substitute is sold and eaten for pure butter, and at butter prices, and sold in defiance of the law. Public welfare demands the enactment of some law that this gross fraud and deception that is now being perpetrated may be suppressed and to protect the 5,000,000 producers of butter, as well as the millions of consumers, and to give the consumers the privilege and right to choose between the genuine article and the unwholesome substitute.

Iowa makes about one-tenth of all the butter made in the United States. In 1900 we shipped out of the State 85,280,715 pounds, and in 1901 89,806,645 pounds; and it is safe to say that an amount equal to this was consumed in the State. It is estimated that the output of butter in that State alone amounts to $37,000,000 per year, and we are injured to the extent of from two to five million dollars every year by this wholesale fraud and deception; and in view of this imposition we demand and are entitled to protection, as are all other producers of butter, and upon this subject we must have national legislation.

Experience has taught us that State laws are inadequate. The purpose of this legislation is not to ruin one industry for the benefit of another. Our aim and purpose is to secure legislation that will insure purity and wholesomeness, and that will give protection to the pure-butter producers against a fraudulent competition, as well as to protect the consumer. Then if anybody wishes to buy this inferior article in preference to pure butter they will be able to buy it for what it is worth and not be swindled and compelled to pay butter prices. Canada absolutely prohibits the making of counterfeit butter or cheese and is now reaping the benefit for foreign trade.

Be not deceived by the statement that is frequently made that such legislation would ruin the cattle and cotton-seed industries or this country. It has been claimed that such legislation would affect the price of cattle to the extent of $2 to $4 per head. What an absurdity.

It was claimed by one of your representatives before our committee that we slaughter annually 7,000,000 cattle. According to the estimates in the Yearbook, we annually slaughter more than 5,000,000 head. Taking your own figures, 7,000,000 head at $3 per head makes a total of $21,000,000. Compare this amount with the report made by the manufacturers of oleo themselves to the Treasury Department and reported to this House, in accordance with a resolution passed by the Fifty-sixth Congress, which shows that only $2,313,333 worth of oleo oil is consumed in the manufacture of oleomargarine. You will see that this $2,250,000 is only about one-ninth of the $21,000,000. If so, one-ninth of $3 would be less than 35 cents per head. And that is, if the statement is true that oleo oil is made out of the best fat of the steer, and that it can not be sold for other purposes; but if it is pure and wholesome fat and lard that oleo oil is made out of, it will certainly sell for something, and it is a positive fact that lard is to-day selling for nearly as much as oleo oil. Of course, it is true that oleo oil sells for a little more than lard, but there is also the item of expense in manufacturing oleo oil, and when you deduct the cost of its manufacture you will find there is no difference in the price of oleo oil and lard, and the price of our cattle would not be affected to any considerable extent.

I admit that if the oleo oil is made out of refuse fat from hotels and restaurants, and scrap fat picked up in the alleys and streets and from the horse butcheries, there might be some loss to the manufacturer of oleo oil, as the articles could not be used for any other purposes, and he would be the loser; but nobody will contend that the scrap fats and waste picked up in the streets and alleys will affect the price of the steer. Certainly not to the extent as stated by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, who makes the ridiculous statement that this bill will affect the cattle industry of this country to the extent of $60,000,000 per year. Of all the inconsistent statements made in the committee and upon this floor this is the most absurd. Does not the gentleman know that the cost of the total produce of oleomargarine for any given year is in the aggregate less than $9,000,000? The cost of all the ingredients entering into oleomargarine, including butter, milk, oleo oil, cotton-seed oil, and butter oil, is only about one-seventh of the $60.000,000.

What is true of the cattle industry is also true of the cotton-seed industry of this country. A representative of the cotton-seed industry appeared before the Agriculture Committee last winter and made the statement that the cotton-seed industry in this country aggregated $65,000,000. If you will turn to the Yearbook you will find that we annually export 50,620,219 gallons of cotton-seed oil, valued at about 40 cents per gallon, or a total of $20,250,916, while the report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that only 4,357,514 pounds of cotton-seed oil and 4,342,904 pounds of butter oil, which is practically the same as the cotton-seed oil, was used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, and which is valued at about 5 cents per pound, or a total valuation of $435,000, which is less than one-third of the cotton-seed industry of this country and only about 2½ per cent of the amount exported.

Therefore there is nothing in the claim that just and conservative legislation along these lines would ruin either of these industries, nor would it increase the price of oleomargarine to the consumers. I repeat that these millions of producers are justly entitled to consideration, and that this honest and legitimate industry should be protected against fraudulent competition and deception, as well as protecting the millions of consumers of dairy products who are imposed upon and swindled by this counterfeit.

Purity, honesty, justice, wholesomeness, common sense, and public welfare demand the enactment of this law in order that this infamous, gigantic fraud, deception, and imposition may be stamped out. [Applause.]

The amendments on which the conference committee have been unable to agree appropriate $1,466,225.12.

J. G. CANNON,
S. S. BARNEY,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think of more than one or two matters that I want to explain at this stage of the proceedings, unless some gentleman desires to ask about others. I propose to move the adoption of this report, which would be the first step toward bringing the two Houses into agreement, and then it would be for the House to take such steps as it may deem proper touching the matters still in controversy.

Mr. BARTLETT. As I did not catch very distinctly the reading of the statement of the House conferees, I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] whether by this report the amendment adopted in the House increasing the appropriation for rural free-delivery service is agreed to?

Mr. CANNON. Exactly as it passed the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. The provision adopted by the House with reference to this service is left in the bill?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir; exactly the House provision.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to thank the conferees on the part of the House for securing concurrence in that amendment; and I wish to state, for the satisfaction of the House, that I have the highest possible authority for saying that this appropriation will be used exactly as was intended by the House, notwithstanding it was not in our power to specify the way in which it should be used, to wit, for the increase of the salaries of carriers in the rural-delivery service from $500 to $600 a year from and after the 1st of March for the balance of this year.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one other matter to which I wish to call atention, because the provision which has been adopted amends the law touching expenditures to be made in the future from the contingent funds of the House and the Senate.

For some years past the accounting officers of the Treasury have settled the accounts of expenditures from the contingent funds of the House and the Senate under the law upon the audit of the Committee on Accounts of the House or upon the audit of the corresponding committee of the Senate—the Committee on Contingent Expenses. For some time past it has come to the knowledge of some members of the House that the administration or expenditure of the contingent funds of the two Houses—both the House and the Senate—has been exceedingly loose; and under the loose practice which has prevailed it has been quite within the power of one body or the other to practically legislate, notwithstanding the fact that legislation under the Constitution must be by some measure that passes both Houses and is approved by the President.

The exact matter out of which this question grew was a House amendment to which the Senate has now agreed, providing as follows:

Provided, That hereafter appropriations made for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives or the Senate shall not be used for the payment of personal services except upon the express and specific authorization of the House or Senate in whose behalf such services are rendered, nor shall such appropriations be used for any expenses not intimately and directly connected with the routine legislative business of either House of Congress; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall apply the provisions of this paragraph in the settlement of all accounts of expenditures from said appropriations incurred for services or materials subsequent to the approval of this act.

The necessity for this legislation has existed for years; but the particular matter, I fancy, which caught the attention of the House, as well as the Senate, was a Senate resolution authorizing the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate to report plans for the development and improvement of the entire park system of the District of Colmmbia. That resolution made the Senate contingent fund available to pay the expenses connected with the preparation of such plans. Under the authority of that resolution the committee proceeded to act. Eminent architects were called. Gentlemen whose expenses were all paid by the public were sent to Europe, and their action figured in Associate Press dispatches and various other kinds of dispatches. They adopted a great plan for the improvement of the city of Washington and the District of Columbia, the working out of which would probably cost a couple of hundred million dollars, more or less, and would occupy probably, or ought to occupy, a couple of hundred years. Models were made of the whole thing, and they have been on exhibition in the Corcoran Art Gallery. Arrangements have been made for carting them about the country to various large cities. And so on, and so on.

I undertake to say that if this House had been called upon for such work it would not have agreed to it; but that is a matter within the domain of assertion or prophecy. The main fact, however, is that Congress never did so agree. But the time comes when the contingent fund of the Senate has to be reenforced to pay these expenses, amounting in round numbers up to date to $47,000. As the time came for payment, it seemed to the House that this expenditure had better be stopped, and for the future a limitation had better be put on the expenditures of the contingent funds of both Houses, so as to confine such expenditures to current matters of legislation—ordinary expenditures—and to provide, as is provided with reference to expenditures of every other department of this Government, that these accounts should be audited by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

The House and the Senate are the lawmaking power, and we see to it that every other department of the Government, including the executive, shall not only first be authorized to make the expenditure by law, but, when it is made, that the accounting officers of the Treasury shall audit the accounts and pass them or reject them, as the law provides. Well, as we are the law-making power, it was the opinion of the House when we passed this amendment, as it was the opinion of the House and Senate conferees, that the law-making power should take the same medicine that it made every other department and officer of this Government take, namely, that it should have its accounts audited; and under this provision I apprehend that there will be no further legislation by one body alone, involving the expenditure of $50,000 or a million of dollars; in other words, that legislation shall be as the Constitution intended it should be.

I thought it proper to call the attention of the House to this matter, without criticism upon any individual. My impression is that possibly individuals may have been surprised at this outcome. Probably nobody contemplated at the beginning what the expenditure would be, but you know when we start with architects and specialists and scientists, those having skill and technical knowledge, with the great army of alleged people of that kind, you never know where you are going to stop, and we fortunately now come, if this provision is adopted, to a stopping place.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I realize the importance of the matter upon which the gentleman is speaking, and I want to ask him now if the conferees have reached a conclusion on that matter?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Both bodies have agreed?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Both sets of conferees?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is almost impossible for us to hear the gentleman on this side in the confusion. I want to ask him how the line is to be drawn by the two bodies as to what items shall be allowed and paid from the contingent fund?

Mr. CANNON. I will have the provision read again.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to know exactly how you can tell what is going into the contingent fund.

Mr. CANNON. This includes it, as you will see.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That hereafter appropriations made for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives or the Senate shall not be used for the payment of personal services, except upon the express and specific authorization of the House or Senate, in whose behalf such services are rendered; nor shall such appropriation be used for any expenses not intimately and directly connected with the routine legislative business of either House of Congress; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall apply the provisions of this paragraph in the settlement of all accounts of expenditures from said appropriations incurred for services or materials subsequent to the approval of this act.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How does that get into this bill? Did the Senate insert it, or was it in the House bill?

Mr. CANNON. The House bill substantially contained the provision, and with slight modifications, strengthening it rather than weakening it; this was the agreement.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is new legislation, is it not?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Entirely. I think it is entirely proper, but I was wondering how it got into the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. CANNON. My recollection about it is that some vigilant member——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have no doubt the gentleman's recollection is correct.

Mr. CANNON. That some vigilant member—I do not recall who it was.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It was yourself. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Oh, now it comes to me and I will tell my friend. The Senate came, as I knew it would come, with an extraordinary proposition for an increase of its contingent fund, and I had the impression that the appropriations were so extraordinary that there was but one explanation for it, and therefore, by unanimous consent, when the matter was considered on the Senate amendments in the House, I asked for the adoption of this provision, and the House being clearly of the opinion gave the unanimous consent. It went back to the Senate, and this is the result. It all comes back to me now.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is eminently proper.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. The gentleman understands that the Committee on Accounts, of which I happen to be a member, has resolutions before it frequently to pay officers in the House who fill various positions here the difference between the salaries of the positions to which they were appointed and the salaries ordinarily paid for the labor that they actually perform.

Mr. CANNON. It does not affect that.

Mr. BARTLETT. It ought to affect it.

Mr. CANNON. This does not, because it says, "Shall not be used for the payment of personal services except upon express and specific authorization by the House or the Senate."

Mr. BARTLETT. What I intended to say was, these employees who are not discharging duties for which they were authorized to be paid. For instance, they were appointed as folders and perform the duties of messengers, and they came before our committee and asked for the difference between the pay.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend, as I recollect it, there is a prior statute which prohibits that thing, and I want to be entirely frank with my friend. I believe that that prior statute, with this provision that requires the accounting officers of the Treasury to perform their function, will break up that practice. I think it ought to.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think, so too. I did not ask for that object. I think that thing ought to be put a stop to.

Mr. CANNON. I think that will stop it, except as you provide for it by joint resolution. Now, Mr. Speaker, with these remarks, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Before that motion is submitted, I desire to ask the gentleman one question. What disposition has the conference made of the $500,000 item for the shelter of troops at Manila?

Mr. CANNON. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that matter, as I intended to speak of it in fairness to the House. The Senate, if the gentleman has before him the bill with the Senate amendments, by amendment No. 24 strike out the House provision for the proper protection and shelter of officers, etc., and they inserted the following language by amendment No. 25:

MILITARY POST.

For the establishment in the vicinity of Manila, P. I., of a military post, including the construction of barracks, quarters for officers, hospital, storehouses, and other buildings, as well as water supply, lighting, sewerage, and drainage, necessary for the accommodation of a garrison of two full regiments of infantry, two squadrons of cavalry, and two batteries of artillery, to be available until expended, $500,000.

By the report that is made, the House agrees to the two Senate amendments which strikes out the House provision and inserts the Senate provision which I have just read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Before the gentleman begins, will he answer another question. I would like to know how much increase has been agreed to in the agreement between the two Houses thus far? As I understand it, the bill, when it passed the House, carried $17,168,000, and there has been added to it, by the agreements already made by the two Houses, how much? The Senate added a little over three millions.

Mr. CANNON. By the agreement the bill has increased about a million a half.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. You have agreed to half of the increase the Senate made, in round numbers?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, no.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They increased it over three millions, and you have agreed to a million and a half. There are about a million and a half in the remaining amendments not agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. About a million and a half in the matters yet open. Now, Mr. Chairman, the committee of conference have been unable to agree to $1,466,235.12. Now, there are certain amendments in here on which the conferees report that the Senate further insist on. There are amendments 1, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, and 78. Amendments 73 to 77, inclusive, are for the refund of expenses incurred in raising volunteers—namely, the State of Maine, $131,000 and some odd dollars; Pennsylvania, $689,000 in round numbers; New Hampshire, $108,00 in round numbers; Rhode Island, $124,000 in round numbers. These various claims have been audited by the auditing officers of the Treasury Department under the principle laid down in the case of the State of New York against the United States, reported in 160 U. S. Reports, as I recollect it. Now, Senate amendment 78 I will read:

And the claims of like character arising under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat., p. 276), and joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stat., p. 615), not heretofore allowed or heretofore disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be reopened, examined, and allowed, and if deemed necessary shall be transmitted to the Court of Claims for findings of fact or determination of disputed questions of law to aid in the settlement of the claims by the accounting officers.

Now, then, this Senate amendment was adopted for the purpose, and in my judgment the amendment would accomplish that purpose, of enabling certain States that presented claims for so-called interest that was paid upon indebtedness that they made under the act of 1861 and 1862, and which were rejected by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, but which are upon all fours with the New York claims on which a recovery is had. It enables those States to have claims reopened and audited, so as to receive the same treatment that the Supreme Court of the United States gave to the State of New York when it rendered judgment against the United States, which was believed by the Senate to be a proper provision.

It was believed by the Senate to be a proper provision. In my judgment, it is a proper provision. But, for the purpose of having no question whatever as to just what is meant by this Senate amendment, my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], upon the Committee on Appropriations, has prepared an amendment which I understand he desires to offer, and which, it seems to me, would make it absolutely sure that if the Senate provision was so amended there would be accomplished, what it seems to me, the Senate desired to accomplish and what, in my judgment, ought to be accomplished.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him if he knows how much of an expenditure this amendment will involve?

Mr. CANNON. It is stated here.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Yes; Maine, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island——

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. My question is, How much in addition will this amendment probably involve?

Mr. CANNON. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. HEMENWAY. About two millions and a half.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Indiana informs me as near as can be ascertained about two millions and one-half.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. That includes the States named as well as the others that have claims?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. I did not give as close attention to the aggregate of the matter as did the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman if he recalls the claims which were placed by the Senate amendment on the sundry civil bill last year and which were rejected by the House after debate—the claim of the State of Nevada and the claims of California and Oregon?

Mr. CANNON. I recollect them very well.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Will the adoption of either of these amendments in any way involve claims of that character?

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me not; but, in order to make it absolutely sure, so that there can be no question about it, the gentleman from Indiana has prepared an amendment that I think specifically covers such claims only as were covered by the Supreme Court in the State of New York against The United States. I think without that they would not be covered. Certainly, from what the conferees of the Senate say, there was no intention to cover them, and from my knowledge of them, with the best examination I can give them, I feel quite sure that they are not covered. Those claims the gentleman referred to covered bounty and double pay——

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Yes; bounty and extra pay; and if the principle was once recognized the expenditure would amount to a billion dollars.

Mr. CANNON. I think they are clearly not covered by this amendment, but if my friend will yield, I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana to offer his amendment, and I think that will answer the question better than I can do it, because it forecloses any possible question that might arise as to whether these claims the gentleman refers to are covered.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 78 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"And the claims of like character arising under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861 (12 Stats., p. 276), and joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stats., p. 615), as interpreted and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the State of New York against The United States, decided January 6, 1896 (160 U. S. Rep., p. 598), not heretofore allowed or heretofore disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury shall be reopened, examined, and allowed; and if deemed necessary shall be transmitted to the Court of Claims for findings of fact or determination of disputed questions of law to aid in the settlement of the claims by the accounting officers."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois explaining this matter, I do not think I need to say anything, unless some gentleman wishes to ask a question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is not that the amendment which was carried from the House to the Senate?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Almost; but there is some difference.

Mr. CANNON. We adopt the decision of the Supreme Court, which the other did not contain.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We confine it to the case decided in the Supreme Court wherein the State of New York is plaintiff against the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. And that amendment will exclude the claims of Nevada and California and Oregon?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Would it not be better to strike out the word "like" and put in the word "same," as I am not sure but the Nebraska claim would be covered as it now stands?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, I think not.

Mr. SIMS. As I understand, the gentleman's amendment will apply to all States having claims coming under this decision—that it is a general law in that respect.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes; following the suggestion that the gentleman made to me some time ago.

Mr. SIMS. I think that is much wiser than having these separate bills coming in from time to time.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Would the gentleman from Indiana have any objection to this amendment: After the word "and," in line 21, insert the words "if found to be in the scope of said decision, may be allowed?"

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not believe that is necessary. This clearly confines it to claims of the same kind that were allowed in the four States that have been determined. There is no doubt but that this amendment, which has been gone over very carefully and submitted to the Comptroller of the Treasury, confines the claims to those covered by the New York decision and no others.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this statement: I know that the gentleman from Indiana does not intend to accomplish it, but it might be possible under his amendment. The gentleman is making it mandatory on the accounting officers to allow claims of a like character with those described in that decision of the Supreme Court. Now, it might be that the claims would turn out to be ill founded. If they are claims that must be allowed, they would have to be allowed. Why not say "may" be allowed?

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, they could not be claims not well founded if they were similar to the New York claims. I want to say that they are on all fours with the New York claims.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. You are in substance adjudicating on the claims here at this time without knowing anything about the amount. It is adjudicating on the amount of it, because you say that claims that are made under the provisions of that statute must be allowed as they are made.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes; but the gentleman must not misunderstand the matter. It does not go to the extent of fixing any amount. It says that they shall allow the claims after being properly audited and passed upon by the Court of Claims.

Some claims for interest account and similar expenses were filed against the Government and passed upon adversely prior to the decision in the New York case referred to in 160 United States Reports, page 598.

Other claims involving a similar principle and equity were not filed, possibly for the reason that the adverse action was anticipated.

In view, however, of the decision of the Supreme Court in the New York case, where the court held a claim for interest was an equitable and just claim against the Government, it is only fair that since such decision clearly fixes the liability of the Government with all States where the claim is clearly just the Government should now accept such claim as fair and just and provide for the payment of the same.

The amendment proposed clearly intends to cover two classes of cases—one where the claims have been disallowed by the accounting officers and those where the accounting officers have not allowed them, or where they have not even been considered by the accounting officers—so long as the cases of either of which two classes fall within the principle laid down in the New York case referred to.

The State of Indiana, my own State, sold bonds in order to raise funds to equip the volunteers, and in the sale of such bonds not only suffered by loss of an interest account, but, owing to the unfortunate situation that existed at that time in the State, the bonds were sold at a discount, making the discount and interest both losses to the State, and consequently a just and equitable charge against the Government.

The States of Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Kentucky clearly fall within the same intent of this proposed amendment, coming as they do clearly within the principles laid down by the decision in the New York case.

There is no more reason why the claim should have been paid to the State of New York than the claims should now be paid to the States of Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Kentucky.

It is thought wise, therefore, that rather than compel each of these States to urge its claim singly and alone by way of special legislation before Congress, by an amendment in the language here proposed all of these States which fall within the purview and principles of the decision of the New York case shall be provided for in order that justice may be done each in the discharge of their several claims.

It is no more than fair and just that so long as these several States which I have just named each holds a claim against the Government of a similar nature to that of the New York claim, that the accounting officers should be required by mandatory statute to reopen such claims as have heretofore been disallowed and examine and allow them under the principles set forth in the New York decision, and also fair that no claim which had not been acted upon by the accounting officers because it had not been pressed, so long as it stands on all fours with the New York case, should also be considered and allowed.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a vote.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, and 77, and agree to the same. These amendments relate to claims that have already been audited.

The motion of Mr. CANNON was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, that disposes of all the amendments except amendment numbered 1.

Mr. BARNEY. If my colleague on the committee will yield for the purpose, I move that the House recede from its diagreement to Senate amendment No. 1 and agree to the same. This amendment provides for the payment of what are known as the La Abra and Weil claims. The facts in this case seem to be about these: Something more than thirty years ago this Government and the Government of Mexico entered into treaty relations by the terms of which claims of the citizens of Mexico against this Government and claims of citizens of this Government against Mexico were submitted to a commission composed of one commissioner selected by this country, one by Mexico, and Sir Edward Thorton as the referee. Various claims were allowed by that commission against both Governments. Among them were these two claims, amounting to something more than a million dollars, and it was provided that Mexico should pay these claims in installments.

Before Mexico had made any payment upon these claims she protested against their payment, alleging that they had been founded in perjury and fraud. But early in these payments she presented no evidence on this subject, but simply made the naked protest, which our State Department did not consider sufficient to warrant us in holding up the claims. So a part of them were paid, the sums paid amounting altogether to $412,572. After that, evidence was presented to the State Department of this perjury and fraud, and subsequent payments were held up. Thereupon, these claims pressing for payment against the General Government, Congress by law provided for an action to be begun by the Attorney-General against the La Abra Mining Company and the Weil Mining Company for the purpose of determining the question whether these claims were founded upon perjury and fraud or not. That action was tried, and the judgment of the Court of Claims was that these claims were founded upon perjury and fraud and ought not to be paid. But the court in its findings also found that the Government of Mexico had been guilty of laches and negligence in not presenting its case before this commission when the claims were originally allowed. Thereupon, this Government paid to Mexico the balance of the sum which had been paid to us, and which remained in our hands and not paid over to the claimants; and the minister of Mexico, in an exceedingly courteous note acknowledging the payment of these sums, released this Government from any claim on account of the sums which had already been paid to these claimants.

Now, I want to say frankly that as I look at this whole case I see no legal claim and no equitable claim against this Government on the part of Mexico. I do not believe that if the circumstances were all taken into consideration as they would be between individuals a court of equity would ever give the Government of Mexico a single dollar against the United States; because, while unquestionably those claims were founded in perjury and fraud, the court holds that the Government of Mexico ought to have known of these facts and ought to have presented them to this Commission and had the question properly adjudicated, in which case this Government would never have paid any of these claims at all.

But, now, in consideration of the fact that this perjury and fraud was the perjury and fraud of American citizens against the citizens of a sister Republic and a weak Republic, and taking into consideration the further fact that we are continually having claims against sister republics of the south, and for the purpose of showing our magnanimity toward a weaker Government, and for that matter for the purpose of doing what perhaps no other government on the face of the earth would do, I am willing to repay to Mexico the money which she thus paid to us on account of the fraud and perjury of our citizens.

Another consideration which perhaps ought to be taken into account is the fact that many of our citizens are all the time investing their capital in Mexico in the mining and other business. It is in their interest, and incidentally in the interest of us all, that the most friendly relations should continue between this Government and our sister Republic. Under all these circumstances we can afford to be magnanimous to our weaker sister and to go further than even the principles of equity would require us to do in restoring to her money which has been unjustly extorted from her by dishonest American citizens.

I have conferred with the State Department about this matter, and they agree substantially with me as to the equities of this case, yet payment is recommended by the office of the Secretary of State. It was called for in the message of President Roosevelt and was called for in one of the messages of President McKinley. Therefore, taking all these facts into consideration, I hope the motion will prevail and this amendment will go upon the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a vote.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I believe that disposes of the bill, Mr. Speaker. This bill will go to the Senate with a message covering the action of the House without any formal motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, then, will recognize the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY].

LEAVE TO COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS TO SIT DURING SESSIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Indian Affairs be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York, Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, asks unanimous consent that that committee be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

OLEOMARGARINE.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9206.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Pending that, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My parliamentary inquiry is this, Mr. Speaker: The House having the other day by unanimous consent given a legislative day to the general discussion of the oleomargarine bill and another day to discussion under the five-minute rule, the bill to be displaced temporarily by appropriation matters presented to the House, this morning the matter which has just been concluded was presented and has consumed very nearly if not quite an hour. Will that time be added to the time of general debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the House gave a legislative day for the general debate on the oleomargarine bill, and the time which has been otherwise occupied to-day would be lost to the oleomargarine bill. Of course it is in the power of the House to sit later than 5 o'clock if it desires to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that without some further order from the House the general debate on the oleomargarine bill will end with this legislative day.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What I want is a construction of the order already existing. I do not want to ask any further time from the House. I want a construction of the order already existing. Now, that order was that a day be given to general debate upon this question and another day to debate under the five-minute rule, the subject being temporarily displaced by appropriation bills. Now, if you can occupy an hour in this manner and take it away from the time to be given to the oleomargarine bill, why could not the whole of the other day have been taken away in the same manner because an appropriation bill was brought up and discussed during the entire day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not feel called upon to answer that conundrum, but it is clearly of the opinion that the order means one legislative day.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, is a legislative day five hours?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the order would end the general debate with the end of this legislative day.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No special day was designated in the original agreement. It just said "a day."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House had already commenced the consideration of the oleomargarine bill in general debate to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Before we go into the committee I want to ask unanimous consent that the fifty minutes just now consumed in the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill be added to the session this afternoon for general debate upon the oleomargarine bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Mississippi that this is entirely in the province of the majority of the committee. There is no rule requiring that the House shall adjourn at 5 o'clock, and the matter is in the control of the committee, so that a majority of the committee can determine when the committee shall rise.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My object in asking it was because I supposed the House alone could deal with that question.

Mr. PAYNE. The committee need not rise until 6 o'clock, if it so desires.

Mr. LACEY. Or 7 or 8 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine, with Mr. LACEY in the chair.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of submitting any remarks upon the pending bill until quite recently; but after hearing some of the remarks of the opposition I have concluded to make a few observations on some of the provisions of the bill, and in doing so, to refer to some of the arguments that have been advanced in opposition to the measures proposed by the bill.

The observations in opposition have certainly taken a very wide range—wide enough, indeed, to take in every element, whether in favor of or opposed to the pending measure. The arguments used display an ingenuity almost unheard of on the floor of this House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], in addressing the House in opposition to the bill the other day, stated:

> Let us examine briefly these two measures and see what it is that they would accomplish if enacted. The majority bill on its face provides that oleomargarine shall be subject in any State to the laws of that State.
> Now, as 32 States, through their legislatures, have been prevailed upon to pass laws forbidding the manufacture and sale therein of oleomargarine colored in resemblance of butter, if this bill should become a law such colored oleomargarine manufactured in other States could not be taken into and sold in these 32 States, even in the original packages. This would at once deprive oleomargarine of the larger part of the market, and the rest of it would be swept away by the other provisions of the bill, namely, that all oleomargarine colored to resemble butter shall be taxed 10 cents a pound. In other words, this bill is simply aimed at the total and utter destruction of the oleomargarine industry.

The same gentleman, further along in his speech, said:

> And here, on the other hand, are the butter monopolists who are hurt by its sale, who say, "No, we will not let oleomargarine be sold at all—we will crush it out of existence;" for that, Mr. Chairman, is what they will do if they can pass this bill.

The gist of this argument, Mr. Chairman, is that it is the purpose of the pending bill to crush out the oleomargarine industry; to absolutely prevent the sale of the article as a food product.

This certainly is a strong appeal to those interested in the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine and to those who desire to purchase it as an article of food, but the range of argument taken by the opposition goes clear to the other side of the question as well. The pendulum has swung to the other side of the sky, even to the distant horizon. We have heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], in most eloquent terms, give reasons, sufficient unto himself, for going to the fullest extent in opposition to the bill.

Observing that the general drift of public opinion in the country, as well as among the members of the House, is in favor of the provisions of this bill, it has become quite apparent to the opponents of its provisions that in order to successfully defeat its passage by the House it is necessary to gain the support, not only of those who are interested in the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine and those who prefer it as an article of food to pure butter, but also to enlist in the opposition those who still believe in maintaining the reputation of the American cow and of holding her in that high esteem that she has from time immemorial gained in the barnyard of every well-regulated household.

I am not able to give the exact language of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], but he stated, in substance, that if the bill should pass and become a law it would result in removing the prejudice now existing against oleomargarine, and create a taste among our people in favor of the product, and in this way build up a great industry that would, in the end, afford a strong competition in the markets of the country with the dairy interest.

And to add emphasis to his remarks, and that they might produce the desired effect, he took occasion to say to those who are here supporting the pending measure on the floor of the House that when the dairy interest shall have been driven from the field of operation by the competition of the oleomargarine manufacturer their constituents would reproach them with their want of foresight in not discovering the results that would follow such legislation, and that instead of gaining their good will they would incur the displeasure of their constituents for supporting a measure from which such dire results would follow. Arguments of this kind ought to be convincing to the ordinary mind. They cover every range from one extreme to the other, and are made evidently upon the theory of the old saw, "Pay your money and take your choice."

This kind of argument reminds me of the argument I heard a number of years ago in a trial of a cause, wherein a fellow was being tried on a charge of larceny in stealing coal from a railroad flat car. It was claimed that he took a large lump of coal onto his shoulder and carried it away from the car, and for this cause the prosecution was instituted. Two young attorneys were engaged in the defense, and somewhat in the line of the arguments in opposition to this bill, it was thought, by the attorneys, that it was necessary in order to establish their defense to cover every theory in the case.

One of the attorneys in his argument urged to the jury that the defendant was so short that it was impossible for him to take such a large lump of coal down from the car onto his shoulder and carry it away, while the other attorney urged that the man was so tall that it was impossible for him to take so large a lump of coal from the car up onto his shoulder and make away with it. The jury took a conservative view of the matter and convicted the fellow. So we believe it will be in this case—the House will take a conservative view of the arguments, pursue an intermediate course, adopt the provisions of the bill, and pass it—and we believe the country at large will take the same view and approve their action.

Coming now to another point in the discussion, I will call attention to the arguments of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. He made the following statement the other day in his address before the House:

I oppose it—

Referring to the bill of the majority—because it punishes the manufacturer for a fraud committed, not by him, mark you, but by the retail dealer in butter. He is the man who commits the fraud complained of. He buys the oleomargarine from the manufacturer in wholesale quantities. He takes it to his shop and takes it down into his cellar. You go there and want to buy a pound of butter, and he scoops you out oleomargarine and sells it to you for butter. This is the fraud, and fraud should be stopped, and that is the purpose we have in view in the minority bill. The manufacturer should not be punished. No additional burden should be put on him when he is not committing a dishonest act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, right by the side of this quotation, I desire to read a notice sent out by Mr. W. J. Moxley, of Chicago, April 5, 1899, directed to the trade. It will be remembered that Mr. Moxley was one of the principal oleomargarine manufacturers of the country, and we may take the course pursued by him as the general course pursued by the manufacturers of this article generally. Mr. Moxley is one who has taken, perhaps, as active an interest in opposition to legislation of this kind as any other manufacturer of the article. His notice is as follows:

NOTICE TO THE TRADE.

Inclosed find a color card which is as nearly the color of our butterine as printer's art can represent. Our aim in sending you this card is to enable you to select the proper color suitable for your trade. Mistakes are easily made, but hard to remedy.

In nearly every section of the country there is a difference in the color of butter, and even in certain seasons of the year there is a change, as you will have noticed. In winter butter is of a lighter color than in summer. In many sections this is the result of a difference of the feed of the cattle. We can give you just what you want at all seasons, if we know your requirements. As an example, No. 1 has no coloring matter, No. 2 a little coloring, and so on to No. 8, which is the highest colored goods we turn out. Preserve this card, ordering the color you want by the number, and we will send you just what you want.

Yours, truly,

W. J. MOXLEY.

It is admitted, even by those who are strongly opposing this bill, that those who are engaged in the business of selling oleomargarine are constantly violating the provisions of the existing law, and it is their contention that this does not apply to the manufacturer. What, now, is the purpose of the notice or circular sent out by Moxley to his customers, but to advise them that he will provide oleomargarine in any color that they may desire, so that it will correspond with the color and particular tint of the butter that is placed on the market in the several communities where the oleomargarine is to be shipped and sold? True, the purchaser, when he buys from Moxley, knows that he is buying oleomargarine, but when Moxley gives them this information and ships them the oleomargarine he does so for the purpose of enabling his customers to violate the law.

He prepares the spurious article with the view of reaching the consumer through the deception practiced by him, and he does it for the purpose of extending his own trade, and for that reason is just as guilty of the fraud committed as the party to whom he ships his product. He, as well as the other manufacturers of oleomargarine, rely on the fact that in order to secure a market for their product they must keep in pace in coloring and appearance with the various tints of butter in the communities where the article is to be sold. They realize that without this there will be no sale, or comparatively no sale of their product. This is plainly disclosed in the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] when he says, in reference to the purposes of the bill under consideration:

There would be no objection to this plan if the people would buy the uncolored, but they will not. For some reason, partly from pride, perhaps, but mostly from prejudice, people want their butter, or whatever they use in place of butter, to be yellow.

How has this habit grown up among the people, may I ask, that they "want their butter or whatever they use in place of butter to be yellow?" It is because it is the natural color of the product of butter. It is the habit, I will admit, that has grown up among the people, because yellow, in various tints, is the natural color of butter. Good pure butter made from cream, yellow in color, has been used by the people for many generations, long before the production of oleomargarine was thought of by anyone, and the people have become so attached to it that they desire the pure article, and they desire to obtain an article that they know to be pure, and for that reason they are opposing the proposition to permit oleomargarine manufacturers and sellers to palm off on them a spurious article as butter. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] says "that there would be no objection to the plan proposed by the bill if the people would buy the uncolored article, but they will not." This is a strong reason why the bill is opposed. It is also a strong reason why it should be passed.

This is true, because the oleomargarine makers and sellers must depend upon the reputation built up among the people of this country for pure butter for the sale of their spurious article. When not made in imitation of pure butter it has not the support of that reputation, and is, as is admitted by the gentleman from Illinois, discredited by the people and will not be bought on the markets by them. The gentlemen opposing this bill have entirely failed to explain upon what theory they base the demand that the oleomargarine people have the right to claim and appropriate to themselves and rely for the sale of their article on the reputation built up for themselves by the dairy business of the country. I submit that there is no theory upon which such contention can be successfully maintained. Yet it is this that lies at the foundation of the opposition to the pending measure for the purpose of extending their trade.

Let me now call the attention of the House to another point in this discussion. I desire here to examine some of the statements in the minority report of the Committee on Agriculture. The minority report makes this statement:

It is charged, and doubtless truly, that the present law is violated by unscrupulous retailers.

And without being very far from the truth it might well say "that the present law is violated by all retailers," and still go one step further and say that the manufacturers, for the purpose of extending their trade, place it in the power of the retailer to violate the law and aid and encourage them in so doing.

The minority report further goes on to state:

In conclusion, the members of the Committee on Agriculture who have joined in this minority report beg to assure the House and the country, in the most solemn manner possible, that it has been their earnest intention and is now their determination to do everything possible to be done to enforce the sale of oleomargarine as oleomargarine and to prevent its sale as butter. To prevent fraud and not to impose or hamper a legitimate industry has been and is our purpose.

And to that end, as they claim, the minority submit, with the report, a substitute bill.

It is a rule, I believe, applicable in both legal and moral ethics, that successfully to attack any evil that has become strong or prevalent is to strike at the root of it. Remove the inducement to commit the wrong and a remedy will speedily follow. I am not here to deny or disguise the fact that this is one of the purposes of the measure now under discussion.

Both sides of this question agree that under the present law frauds are committed. Both sides agree that additional legislation is required to prevent this fraud or to reduce it to a minimum. But the division comes in the character of the legislation to be enacted to bring about this much-desired result. Nearly all the discussion had on this question has been confined to the bill reported to the House by the majority of the committee, to its purposes, and to the probable influence that it will have if enacted into a law.

Let me here examine some of the provisions of the minority bill and point out what seems to be its purpose and what effect it would have on existing law and existing relations between the Federal Government and the people of the several States if it were enacted into a law.

Section 6 of the substitute bill provides:

That all oleomargarine shall be put up by the manufacturer for sale in packages of 1 and 2 pounds, respectively, and in no other or larger or smaller package; and upon every print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine, before being so put up for sale or removal from the factory, there shall be impressed by the manufacturer the word "Oleomargarine" in sunken letters, the size of which shall be prescribed by regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; that every such print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine shall first be wrapped with paper wrapper with the word "Oleomargarine" printed on the outside thereof in distinct letters, and said wrapper shall also bear the name of the manufacturer, and shall then be put up singly by the manufacturer thereof in such wooden or paper packages or in such wrappers, and marked, stamped, and branded with the word "Oleomargarine" printed thereon in distinct letters and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and the internal-revenue stamp shall be affixed so as to surround the outer wrapper of each 1 and 2 pound package.

This seems to be very precise in its statements, and it does not sound very bad on casual reading. But the serious objections to this part of the bill are not so much to the provisions here quoted as to the company surrounding them. If these provisions were incorporated into the majority bill as a means of identification and as evidence of the payment of the tax required to be paid on the colored article, speaking for myself alone, I do not know that I should seriously object. But the joker follows and is contained in the proviso which declares:

Provided, That any number of such original stamped packages may be put up by the manufacturer in crates or boxes, on the outside of which shall be marked the word "Oleomargarine," with such other marks and brands as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, by regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, prescribe.

Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall sell only the original package to which the tax-paid stamp is affixed, and shall sell only from the original crates or boxes in which they receive the pound or 2-pound prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps; which said crates or boxes shall be at all times so placed as to expose to the customer the mark or brand affixed thereon by the requirement of this act.

What is the evident purpose of this proviso? It has a meaning, and it is a deep one. Is it for the purpose of preventing fraud or deception? No. Because the moment these packages go into the hands or the cellars of the dealers, they can remove these stamps and wrappers and pack the oleomargarine in tubs and firkins, and then place it on the market as butter just as conveniently as they are now doing, and without any greater liability to detection than exists under the present law. But the purpose of this section of the substitute, taken in connection with the proviso, is to place the traffic in oleomargarine under the protection of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution and to take away from the several States the power they have under existing law to control its sale when transported from one State into another.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us proceed to examine briefly some of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on this question.

In the case of Leisey v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100) it was held that any article of commerce transported from one State into another came under the protection of the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that the shipper or consignee had the right to sell it in the unbroken "original package" in which it was shipped, and that such sale could not be controlled or prohibited by State law.

In that case it was not determined what constituted an "original package" of commerce. But in the case of Coe v. Errol (116 U. S., 517) it was held that when goods, the product of a State, have begun to be transported—that is, when they have been put in process of transportation from one State to another—and not till then, they become the subject of interstate commerce, and as such become subject to national regulation, and cease to be under the control of State laws.

This principle was affirmed in the case of Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S., 1).

From this it is quite evident that the Supreme Court in using the term "original package" with reference to interstate commerce has reference to the package as formed and made up when it comes under the jurisdiction or protection of the commerce clause of the Constitution; that is, to its form when it was put in process of transportation from one State to another. Then, and not till then, it becomes an article of interstate commerce.

Under the principles announced by these decisions and the existing laws of Congress for the regulation of commerce, when the manufacturer puts up his product in small packages, and then, for convenience of shipment or for other purposes, puts up the small packages in crates, boxes, or barrels, and in this form puts them in process of shipment into another State for sale, it comes within the purview of and remains under the protection of Federal law until these commercial packages are broken, and when that is done the small packages comprising the larger ones become subject to the laws of the State to which they have been consigned. This interpretation of the law defining an "original package" is sustained by the decisions of the Federal circuit courts and by the supreme courts of a number of the States, and the principle is recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, and no court, so far as I am advised, sustains a contrary doctrine.

With this view of the law before us, the motives for the minority amendment become quite apparent.

The States now have the authority, within their own jurisdictions, to control or prohibit absolutely the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in any form, whether it be colored to look like butter or whether it be entirely without coloration, except where its sale is protected as an article of interstate commerce.

Under existing law the commercial packages, made up of the 1 and 2 pound packages, as proposed by the minority amendment, could be put up by the manufacturers and transported by them into another State for sale and sold there without hindrance from State authority, except as the State may control or prevent its sale in the exercise of its power of police regulation; but the moment the package is broken open and the 1 and 2 pound packages are offered for sale, they become subject to the jurisdiction of the State law.

This is the point that the amendment to the bill seeks to avoid. Not only to avoid this, but to have Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional power to regulate commerce between the States, define the package of commerce, or "original package," as it has come to be known, as it applies to the shipment of oleomargarine, and instead of authorizing the sale in the "original packages" only, as defined under existing law, to extend our interstate-commerce laws so as to authorize its sale in broken packages as well; to authorize the sale of oleomargarine in broken packages, uninfluenced by State law. But this is not the only purpose of the minority amendment.

In the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts (155 U. S., 462) it was held that a statute of Massachusetts, preventing absolutely the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in that State when artificially colored so as to cause it to look like butter, but permitting the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like butter, is not in conflict with the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. By this decision of the Supreme Court it was held that oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter and shipped into Massachusetts from another State became subject to the laws of Massachusetts on its arrival in that State.

The minority bill, if adopted, would be an exercise of the power of Congress under the Constitution to regulate commerce, and it would nullify the rule established in the Plumley case, and authorize the sale of the colored product as well as the uncolored, and that, too, in the broken packages, in the face of any prohibitive statute of the State.

In the exercise by Congress of its authority to regulate commerce between the States it may declare what articles are subjects of commerce. It may declare how shipment shall be made, and make such regulations governing the form and size of commercial packages and how they shall be put up and transported as in its wisdom may seem proper.

Were it not for the high standing of the members of the Committee on Agriculture who signed the minority report, after an examination of their substitute amendment, I should be inclined to believe that, coupled with their purposes, so positively asserted, of "their determination to do everything possible to be done to enforce the sale of oleomargarine as oleomargarine and to prevent its sale as butter" there was a further purpose, not so positively asserted, but as plainly apparent, to give to the oleomargarine dealer a field of operation freer from State control than prevails under existing law. But it would perhaps be sufficient answer to this, to consider the fact that the minority amendment is only a paper proposition, without any expectation that the good sense of the American people will ever consent to its being enacted into a law.

The Congress of the United States has not exercised its powers under the Constitution to regulate interstate commerce as it applies to the transportation and sale of oleomargarine, nor does the bill under consideration contemplate such regulation. It leaves the jurisdiction of the State and Federal Governments over the control of the interstate transportation and sale of the article just where it is placed by the Constitution as defined by judicial construction being, uninfluenced by Federal legislation.

But in the minority bill, if it be enacted into legislation, is an exercise of the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce; and in that regulation the package of interstate commerce, or, in other words, the "original package," of commerce is defined; and it is defined to be the 1 and 2 pound package, put up for the protection and benefit of the retail trade. This takes away the power of the State to control the retail trade of the article after the shipment of the package into another State and the package as transported has been broken—a power that the States now possess under existing law as declared by the courts.

What say you, on the other side of the House, who are constantly crying out aloud against every measure that can by any means be construed into a purpose of taking away any of the rights of the States that they now possess? Will you support a measure of this kind? Have you so far changed your "spots" that you are ready to abandon a theory that has been the anchor of your political faith for generations, and say, now that so far as the protection of the reputation of the cow is concerned, we will yield gracefully our preconceived ideas of State authority to the Federal jurisdiction?

While we all believe that additional legislation is necessary to prevent fraud in the sale of oleomargarine, let us be practicable and adopt a measure that will strike at the root of the evil and enact into law the pending measure before the House.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], in the course of his remarks against the pending bill, refers to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania (171 U. S., 1), and quotes from the opinion in that case that "oleomargarine had become a proper subject of commerce among the States and foreign countries," and then goes on to say:

Yet in the face of this decision of our highest court it is now coolly proposed by the promoters and sponsors of this bill to wipe out the entirely proper and legitimate industry of the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. And why? This is not stated in the bill, but in the reports and remarks on the subject of oleomargarine is referred to as an "adulterated article of food."

It is a sufficient answer to the gentleman to place alongside of the quotation from the Supreme Court in the Shollenberger case and the vigorous remarks of the gentleman the following quotation from the same court in the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts, which was also an oleomargarine case:

Says the court—

It will be observed that the statute of Massachusetts which is alleged to be repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution does not prohibit the manufacture or sale of all oleomargarine, but only such as is colored in imitation of yellow butter produced from pure, unadulterated milk or cream of such milk. If free from coloration or ingredient that "causes it to look like butter" the right to sell it "in a separate and distinct form and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character," is neither restricted nor prohibited. It appears in this case that oleomargarine, in its natural condition, is of a light yellowish color, and that the article sold by the accused was artificially colored in imitation of yellow butter.

Now, the real object of coloring oleomargarine so as to make it look like genuine butter is to make it appear to be what it is not, and thus induce unwary purchasers who do not closely scrutinize the label upon the package in which it is contained to buy it as and for butter produced from unadulterated milk or cream from such milk. The suggestion that oleomargarine is artificially colored so as to render it more palatable and attractive can only mean that customers are deluded by such coloration into believing that they are getting genuine butter.

If anyone thinks that oleomargarine not artificially colored so as to make it look like butter is as palatable or as wholesome for purposes of food as pure butter, he is, as already observed, at liberty under the statutes of Massachusetts to manufacture it in that State or sell it there in such manner as to inform the customer as to its real character. He is only forbidden to practice in such matters a fraud upon the public. The statute seeks to suppress false pretenses and to promote fair dealing in the sale of an article of food. It compels the sale of oleomargarine for what it is to prevent its sale for what it is not.

Can it be that the Constitution of the United States secures to anyone the privilege of manufacturing and selling an article of food in such a manner as to induce the mass of the people to believe that they are buying something which in fact is wholly different from that which is for sale? Does the freedom of commerce among the States demand a recognition of the right to practice deception upon the public in the sale of any article, even those that may have become the subject of trade in different parts of the country?

If the gentlemen who are opposing the pending measure, and who have been copious in their quotations from the Supreme Court of the United States respecting the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine as a proper product for food and interstate commerce, are willing to take the opinion of that court as expressive of the true moral phase of the question involved in such legislation as is proposed by this bill, then I would most earnestly commend them to a careful reading of the opinion of that court in the Plumley case.

In conclusion, I desire to read an extract or two from remarks made by me when the Grout bill was under consideration in the House during the Fifty-sixth Congress, which is equally applicable to the pending bill, and expressive of some of my views relating to the same:

"This decision is based upon the principle that the statute of Massachusetts, which contains provisions similar to the statutes of many of the other States, was enacted for the purpose of protecting its citizens from deception and fraud; and it recognizes the fact that the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, when artificially colored in imitation of pure butter for the purpose of making it appear like butter and to induce its sale as such, is a fraud upon the public which the legislatures of the several States have the right to prohibit by proper legislation.

"While the laws of these States prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine when colored in imitation of butter have been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States as within the power reserved to the several States under the Federal Constitution, they have proven entirely inefficient to accomplish the purpose designed by their enactment.

* * * * * * *

"The manifest purpose of this bill is to secure the cooperation of the State and Federal authorities to prevent the fraudulent manufacture and dealing in oleomargarine; to protect the public, who desire a pure article of butter, as well as the butter makers against fraud and deception, and to require that olemargarine, when placed on the market, stand on its own merits as oleomargarine and not on the reputation of pure butter.

* * * * * * *

"Oleomargarine is a much cheaper article and can be produced at a much less cost and put upon the market at a much less price than genuine dairy and creamery butter. The object of this section is to adopt this as a revenue measure by the General Government, and as an incident to this measure to prevent the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine when artificially colored in imitation of butter, or to place such a tax upon it that when placed upon the market the actual cost of doing so to the producer will be as great, or nearly as great, as the cost of making or manufacturing and placing upon the market pure butter; or, to state the proposition in other words, it proposes to require the oleomargarine manufacturer or dealer to pay a tax on oleomargarine colored as butter large enough to raise the expense to the producer equal to the expense of producing pure butter or to rely for a sale of his product upon its actual merits without deception or fraud in artificially coloring it to resemble pure butter and then selling it on the market as such.

"If the bill now pending becomes a law, it will leave the oleomargarine dealer and manufacturer the right and privilege of manufacturing and selling their product upon the market without restriction, except the payment of a tax of one-fourth of 1 cent per pound; and all those who desire or prefer to use oleomargarine instead of pure butter, because they may think it better or cheaper than butter, will have the opportunity of buying it at its real and actual value and price. The oleomargarine in its natural color is as palatable and as healthful as a food product, and it may be as handsome in appearance as genuine yellow butter, but when it does not have the coloring the opportunities for deceiving the public and realizing the profits by reason of the reputation of creamery butter are removed. The proposition that this is a proper subject of legislation in the interests of honest and legitimate trade, so far as applies to dairymen and butter makers and also to the public who desire to use dairy products, can hardly be controverted.

"It is claimed by those who oppose this bill that the manufacture of oleomargarine has grown to be a great industry, and that, if this bill becomes a law, it will materially affect this industry and impair the large capital invested in the oleomargarine business and throw many people engaged in that business out of employment. If we admit this to be true, it presents no argument against the bill, but rather sustains the proposition that the bill ought to be passed. There is nothing in the bill that imposes any restriction on the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine with its natural color, except the tax of one-fourth of 1 cent per pound, and to this tax there seems to be but little objection. If the only objections made to the bill were confined to this provision, speaking for myself alone, I should be willing to see this provision stricken out.

"Under the second section of this bill the manufacturer of oleomargarine, with the exception of the small tax imposed, has the same freedom to manufacture and put his product on the market as and for olemargarine as the dairyman has to put his product on the market as and for pure butter. But this is not what the oleomargarine manufacturer wants. He wants to put his product on the market without restriction, not as oleomargarine, but as and for genuine dairy or creamery butter; and his objection to the bill arises from the fact that it requires him to pay the tax of 10 cents per pound when it is colored in resemblance of butter, and in this way raises the expense of putting his product on the market up to the price of creamery butter. This removes the opportunity for large profits. The butter dealer sells his product for what butter is actually worth on the market. The oleomargarine dealer wants the privilege of selling his, not for what it is actually worth on the market as oleomargarine, but for the price that butter brings on the market. The fact is, there is not now and never has been a market price, open and public, for oleomargarine between dealers and consumers. It has never been put on open market as oleomargarine. The evidence taken before the committees of Congress plainly establish the fact that it would not find purchasers if offered for sale as oleomargarine. It is therefore put on the market as butter and at butter prices.

"It is further urged that oleomargarine is a healthful food product and can be produced much cheaper than butter, and that those who desire to buy the cheaper article ought to be permitted to do so. We may admit this to be true. But the fact remains that the pending bill does not attempt to impose restrictions on the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine as such, but on the contrary it requires that it be designated as a distinctive product, so that those who desire it may have the genuine article, without coloring to resemble butter, at oleomargarine prices. If uncolored, all chance of deception and fraud is removed, and the party who wants to buy the stuff at its actual value will have the privilege of doing so and will get a cheaper food product for what it is worth; but when colored to resemble butter, and sold as butter, he must pay butter prices. Oleomargarine colored in resemblance of butter is not sold at oleomargarine prices, because that would disclose its identity and destroy the demand for it as a butter."

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, after the magnificent argument of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], and the clear and unanswerable reasoning against the enactment of this bill by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and the equally strong protests of other gentlemen there remains little to be said. I would not consume the time allotted to me if I did not believe that I would sin against the people who sent me here if I remained quiet while they were being robbed.

I have sat through this debate for several days and listened, with more or less patience, to what has been said on both sides of the question. I have heard many excellent reasons advanced why this piece of selfish and flagrant class legislation should not be enacted, but, with all due respect to my friends who support it, no adequate reason for its passage.

Parrot-like, they have all gotten up and shouted, "Fraud!" and then ignored the minority bill, which would cure the fraud of which they complain, if fraud there be.

Like Gratiano, they "speak an infinite deal of nothing. Their reasons are as two grains of wheat in two bushels of chaff. You shall seek all day ere you find them, and when you have them they are not worth the search."

THE PURPOSE OF THE BILL.

This measure has been before Congress for some years, and yet members of this House and others are disputing as to its purpose.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY] says that his purpose is to prevent the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine as butter, but slyly and aside he admits a pressure from certain Wyndham County dairymen, who I suspect care much less for the alleged fraud than they do for an advancing butter market.

By looking at the writings and the speeches of the real authors of the bill, by studying their testimony before the committee, we can form a correct estimate of their purpose in proposing and pushing it.

Certain manufacturers of butter have been here urging the adoption of the majority report and the passage of the bill. Read the hearings carefully, and it will not take you long to learn that this pretended desire to suppress fraud is the rankest humbug. They are not concerned for morals. They have no antipathy to counterfeits, because they themselves are counterfeits. What they want is a bill in the interest of their dairies, a bill which will compel consumers to pay more for their products, a bill which takes the dollars out of one man's pockets and puts them into the pockets of another man. A star witness for the advocates of this bill, a special pleader of eminence and ability, is an ex-governor of Wisconsin, whose examination by Mr. WILLIAMS demonstrated unusual ability in evasion. His mental agility while pleading for moral butter markets, and incidentally for the protection of his own butter farm, commands my profound respect.

Rarely could the most ingenious cross-examination elicit a frank answer to a simple question. Clever man though he is, it seemed impossible to make him understand that if it is sinful to color wholesome oleomargarine into the semblance of yellow June butter, it must also be wicked to color wholesome white butter into the semblance of yellow butter. He could not be persuaded to admit that both would be frauds intended to deceive the consumer for the greater profit of the seller.

Turn to pages 32 and 33 of the hearings, and you will find that Mr. SCOTT, of Kansas, asked ex-Governor Hoard this question:

I was simply asking whether this bill would be demanded if, after its passage, just as much oleomargarine would be manufactured and put on the market as is now manufactured and sold?

To which Mr. Hoard replied:

In that case, sir, I would come before Congress and demand a still higher tax.

From which reply, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen what is the real purpose of the most distinguished advocate of the bill outside this Hall.

He and his have decreed the death of the oleomargarine industry. If this outrageous bill will not do the deed, he will come and demand a rate of taxation that will destroy it.

There seems to be some dispute about the statement of Mr. Adams, the pure-food commissioner of the State of Wisconsin, but he is reported in the hearings of the last Congress to have said, and Mr. WADSWORTH, of New York, and Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, both honorable and intelligent men, affirm that he did say, that the purpose of this bill is to drive the oleomargarine manufacturers out of business.

But there is still another witness to the purpose of this bill, one Knight—an errant knight, it seems to me—who went on record with this statement: "We have a remedy almost at hand which will eliminate the manufacture of this article [oleomargarine] from the pure-food product list."

Knight, from his obscurity, speaks frankly what the eminent ex-governor of Wisconsin fears to say but evidently wishes to accomplish. Clearly, sir, the purpose of the bill is to destroy one honest American industry and to build up another at the expense of the consuming public. It is a frank assault upon one useful and beneficent article of commerce by another which was honest and beneficent until it conceived and promoted this scheme of robbery.

CAREER OF DISHONESTY AND HYPOCRISY.

The legislative career of this bill has been marked by dishonesty and hypocrisy. It first demanded the repression of the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine as an unhealthful food. The common sense of the people who consumed it and the learning of the scientific men who examined it drove them from that position. It was necessary to have a new shibboleth, a battle cry which would not make them absurd every time they uttered it, and so they took up the cry of fraud.

Had there been any truth in their original contention that oleomargarine was unwholesome, it was the duty of government State and national, to forbid its manufacture, not to regulate its sale.

Evidence taken by committees charged with the investigation of this article of food, the testimony of witnesses who know the conditions under which the butter of commerce and the oleomargarine of commerce are made, shows that the latter is not only as wholesome as the best butter, but cleaner than any but the best butter.

It being established by the testimony of competent witnesses that it is as wholesome and as clean as well-made butter, I am moved to ask what quarrel any man can have with this excellent food which modern science has given us?

It is a question of color. They tell us that it is colored in imitation of butter. They all hark back to the same feeble, foolish cry of fraud in color.

Why are they not frank enough to say that whatever deception there is in coloring is practiced by both?

When this bill was under discussion in the Fifty-sixth Congress one dairy orator said that it was a fraud to color oleomargarine yellow, but a proper thing to color butter yellow. This privilege to practice fraud is claimed as a right by the dairymen. It is what ex-Governor Hoard, of Wisconsin, poetically calls the "copyright of Almighty God."

PROTECTION GONE MAD.

This bill marks a distinct and dangerous step in the policy of protection. It is protection gone mad.

Hitherto the advocates of the peculiar and selfish system of taxation known as the protective policy have been content to get such advantages for their favorites as could be had under the pretense of raising revenue for the support of the Government. But here it is unblushingly put forward in all its hideous nakedness. It has the one virtue of being unmasked. The bill, reduced to its final analysis, is protection individualized, specialized.

NOT A REVENUE MEASURE.

The authors of the bill do not expect to raise public revenues by its enactment; they do not even claim that it is intended to put money into the public Treasury. They are far too clever for that.

They realize that they would be in a ridiculous attitude before the country if they were, at this time, to propose a bill to increase the income of the Government—already collecting $100,000,000 a year more than an extravagant Republican Congress will or can spend.

There were 1,500,000,000 pounds of butter made in this country during the last fiscal year, and 107,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine. Thus, you will see, 1 pound of the already heavily taxed oleomargarine is scaring the life out of 15 pounds of the dairy product, and the latter has evoked the power of the Government for repressive taxation.

Suppose half of the 107,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine pays to the Government a tax of 10 cents a pound, the result will be to put into a Treasury which does not need it, which the great Committee on Ways and Means tells us they do not want, some $5,000,000. That much more money will be taken each year from the people who do need it and turned into a Government which does not.

If the tax is paid and the oleomargarine still consumed, those who eat it will have to pay 10 cents a pound extra for a good, wholesome food, which it should be the aim of the Government to give them at as little cost as possible consistent with a fair profit to the man who produces it.

But if it is not paid and oleomargarine is eaten in its natural color, the price of butter will not be advanced, and the bill will be a disappointment to its authors.

Will they come back then and ask for a still higher tax, as Mr. Hoard, of Wisconsin, suggests, or will they have the courage and frankness to say to Congress, "We want to be absolutely protected against competition; we demand of you a law which will forbid the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine?"

CLASS LEGISLATION.

As I have not the honor to be a member of the legal profession, I shall not try to hint at what the courts may do with this bill. It may be that a wise and thoroughly American President will see it to be his duty to stand between the robber and the victim in this case, and so deprive the courts of the privilege of passing on the question.

But one thing I do know, one thing I have clearly learned from an occasional reading of the Constitution, and that is that in section 8 of the first article it says:

All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

And I also know that to specially and heavily tax one good, wholesome article of food while exempting others is not uniformity, whatever courts and lawyers may say.

No fair-minded man can read the hearings, no fair-minded man familiar with the conditions of its inception and the current history of this legislation can come to any other conclusion than that the taxing power of the Government has been invoked to cripple or destroy one business in the interest of another which happens to have more friends on this floor.

The regulation of food products is an incident of police control in the States. We in Texas do not invite your guardianship. All we want you to do is to leave us our constitutional right of local self-government. We will look after the health and comfort of our own citizens.

HOW IT INJURES OTHER INTERESTS.

There might be less objection to this bill if it merely helped the butter manufacturers. But in helping themselves they hurt others. There are four thousand million dollars invested in breeding cattle in this country. Yet it appears that the voice of this mighty industry, when appealing for justice and fair treatment, can not reach this Chamber. A skillful and active lobby has shut off communication.

More than 6,000,000 cattle are slaughtered every year in less than a dozen cities of this country. Mr. Hoard tries to make it appear that if you killed the oleomargarine industry you would not take over 50 cents a head off these cattle. But if that were true, which it is not, what right have you to rob the cattle growers of $3,000,000 a year to enrich the already prosperous, the admittedly prosperous dairymen?

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not $3,000,000 a year, but three times $3,000,000 which will be taken from the cattle growers by this bill. And in a like way you will tax the growers of swine to increase the prosperity of your pets.

It is unjust, and the bill ought to be revolting to every man, every Democrat particularly.

Are the growers of cattle and swine not entitled to the rights and privileges of all other American citizens; are they not equally entitled to the consideration of government? I submit that question to my fellow-Democrats who are going to support this bill.

For several years our cotton planters have been fighting adverse conditions. When they have had good crops the price has usually been so low that there was no profit in the yield. When they have had good or moderately good prices for cotton it has been because damage to the crop, sometimes local, sometimes general, had cut down the yield. So in neither event have they made money.

Yet you propose a tax, not desirable for revenue, which will add another burden to the cotton planter.

Is there any reason in decency or morals, or in the teachings of the Democratic fathers, I will say to those of my own political faith, for this piece of vicious class legislation?

A DANGEROUS PRECEDENT.

Once started, who can tell where this sort of legislation will end? I do not know whether when it comes from the mill, and before it reaches the refiner, there is any difference in the appearance of cane sugar and beet sugar, but in the minds of many people there is a prejudice in favor of the product of the cane and against that of the beet. I also know that the latter is rapidly dividing the markets of the country with the former.

Let us suppose that there is a difference in the appearance of the sugar as it leaves the mills, and let us further assume that the producers of cane sugar could muster a majority of the votes of this House to their support, would this piece of legislation not be a precedent for placing a similar handicap on the beet grower?

There are a great many more corn growers in this country than there are rice growers. In many households grits, made of corn, is used as we use rice in the South. To the careless observer rice is not unlike grits in appearance.

Now, suppose that in the teeming Northwest the people should conclude that rice, because of its likeness to grits, was hurting their trade, might they not, with this as a precedent, ask for a special tax of 5 or 10 cents a pound on the Southern grain?

You may think my comparison absurd, my illustration overdrawn, but it is not one bit more absurd than this sort of legislation would have been thought a few years ago.

AIDING THE TRUSTS.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, this bill is in aid of a trust. Already there is a butter trust formed and waiting to enjoy the benefits of your legislation. I recently read an account of a new creamery or butter trust organized with a capital of $18,000,000.

The president is to live in New York and struggle along with a salary of $50,000 a year, while the Western manager will try to make both ends meet in Chicago on the paltry sum of $30,000 a year.

Contrast their condition with the much-taxed cotton and cattle growers, upon whose industry is to be laid a special levy to support it.

There are Republicans here who can stand any sort of customs tax aimed at foreigners who gag at the Grout bill.

There are Federalists here, Hamiltonians, whose consciences and judgments protest against this exercise of the Federal power as unprecedented, unwarranted by the Constitution, and dangerous.

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to print as a part of my remarks an account of the creation of the new butter trust in the interest of which this Congress is now legislating. I want the country to know that no sooner is a trust born than a majority of this body hastens to bring it gifts and to see that it has a silver spoon in its mouth.

BIG BUTTER TRUST—TWO KANSAS MEN TO CONSOLIDATE ALL UNITED STATES CREAMERIES—CAPITAL STOCK, $18,000,000—THEY ALREADY CONTROL ABOUT 400 CREAMERIES IN THE WEST—CHARLES H. PATTISON TO BE MANAGER, WITH HEADQUARTERS IN NEW YORK, AND JOHN A. PARKS TO BE WESTERN MANAGER—BOTH POPS.

It was learned here to-night that Charles H. Pattison and John A. Parks, of the Kansas creamery trust, had swung the deal they have been working on for the organization of a gigantic creamery trust to take in all the large creameries of the country. The new corporation is to be known as the National Creamery Company, and will have a capital of $18,000,000. It will be chartered in New Jersey. Headquarters will be established in New York, with a branch in Chicago. Pattison will be vice-president and manager of the concern, and will live in New York. John A. Parks will be manager of the Western business, with headquarters at Chicago. Pattison is to receive $50,000 a year salary and Parks $30,000.

Parks is president of the Continental Creamery Company, known as the Kansas Creamery Trust, and Pattison is secretary and treasurer. They are two Kansas boys, and only a few years ago were as poor as Job's turkey. Contrary to the rule, they got their start in politics. For many years both worked in the newspaper business in Colorado. Pattison ran a paper in a mining camp for three months, when the camp's population consisted only of Pattison and the postmaster. The other people all moved to another place, where a rich gold strike was made. Pattison had to stay and print his paper in order to get pay for some legal notices, and the postmaster stayed because he was getting a good salary to do so. His salary was based on the population of the town before the inhabitants all moved away. Parks also knocked around setting type in the country newspaper offices in Colorado.

Finally the two drifted to Kansas. Parks got hold of the Beloit Call and made it one of the best country weeklies in Kansas. Pattison went to Abilene and got a job in a bank. During the Populist wave, Pattison was elected county treasurer of Dickinson County and Parks was later elected State printer. Neither one "blew in" his money. Each saved it, and after they got out of office they began to buy up creameries. They made money hand over fist and reinvested it in more creameries. Then they organized the Continental Creamery Company and consolidated all of their creameries. They still continued to gobble up Western creameries until they own about 400, including skimming stations, in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and Oklahoma. Inspired by success with their Kansas creamery trust, they set to work to organize a trust on a larger scale. Pattison went to New York and presented the possibilities of a creamery trust to the moneyed men and, as given out to-day, he has completed the deal.

[Loud applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks of Mr. SLAYDEN the Chairman, at the expiration of ten minutes, said: The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I occupied? I had ten minutes originally, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] told me that he would yield me ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been shortened one hour.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But I had ten minutes in the first place, and afterwards an additional ten minutes yielded by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask that the gentleman from Texas be allowed to proceed for ten minutes longer. The speech which he is making is very instructive.

Mr. WOOTEN. I wish to ask a parliamentary inquiry. While we were in the House a few minutes ago, a question was raised as to the making up of the time which we had lost on this question by business of the Appropriations Committee interrupting this order; and it was ruled that it would be the province of the committee to decide that question. Fifty minutes were consumed here this morning in the discussion of a conference report; and I ask unanimous consent of the Committee of the Whole that fifty minutes be added to the time allowed for this general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. That matter is entirely within the control of the House when the committee shall rise.

Mr. WOOTEN. It ought to be decided now, so that the time to be allotted to different speakers may be determined.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will have to be settled after we get back into the House.

Mr. WOOTEN. I ask unanimous consent that fifty minutes be added to the time allowed for general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole can rise in order that that question may be settled, but it can not be done in this way. The gentleman from Texas claims that in addition to the ten minutes to which he was entitled he was yielded ten minutes more by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, Ohio is a State not alone great in agriculture. It has so many and varied industries that to repeat them would almost be the recapitulation of all the trades and pursuits of man.

Mining, manufacturing, shipping by land and by water, horticulture, and every avocation join with agriculture to make the Buckeye State one of the leading States of the Union. In my own district nearly every industry is represented, and with their varied interests their wants are many and often conflicting, but upon this question I have heard no dissenting voice; all are agreed that it is well to prevent fraud, and I am in favor of the passage of the bill, not simply because the sentiment of the people is favorable to it, but because I believe it is a wise and just measure.

Truly, one might think, in looking over the actions of the several Congresses in late years, that the policy of the majority party had been based upon the text "He that hath, to him shall be given: and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath." Year after year the "infant" industries have been "protected" and fostered by special legislation, favoritism, special privileges, and monopolies until we have witnessed the most gigantic combinations of capital, under the control of these favored syndicates and trusts, ever known in the world's history. These organized creatures of greed and cupidity have but to send a message here stating their wishes or commands, and the Republican majority hasten to register their acquiescence in the scheme, no matter how nefarious it may be, but now, when agriculture, when the farmer, whose labor is at the foundation of all industries, comes, not to ask a special favor, not to demand tribute, not to injure or destroy any proper, honorable, or legitimate industry, but simply asks that we raise a bulwark against an encroachment upon the right and just exercise of his business and help him defend himself from a fraud and an imposition that threatens his well-being—now when he comes to us asking justice, shall he plead in vain?

We hear the criticism that this bill did not originate here in Congress, but came from the farm. To me that is one of the strong points in its favor. When a bill comes before us bearing the earmarks of the lobby, it is always well to examine it closely and put the burden of proof upon its advocates to show its merits. The syndicates, the lords of Wall street, have their agents here continually; they dog one's steps at all hours, demanding indorsement of the legislation they devise and threatening with their vengeance anyone who has manhood enough to express an opinion and have a will of his own. They have their attorneys and an organized corps of lobbyists and experts, with money and influence, to use every means possible to put through their measures; they crowd the committee rooms day after day, to secure quick and favorable reports; but the farmers, how about them? They can not, and do not, come here to lobby and bulldoze. They exercise their right of petition, and ask us as a representative body to give their cause a fair hearing. If there be any class among the millions of our people who deserve to be heard upon this floor, and whose needs and requests should be heeded, it is the farmers of our land. They are the mainstay of the country; why, it is even by their labor that we live and move and have our being, for, sift the whole fabric of society, the whole question of material life, to the foundation, and we find, after all, that the farmer is the man upon whom we must all depend.

There is no more conservative class of people in all our domain than the farmer, and in their conservatism they have been so disinclined to disturb existing conditions, so moderate in resisting imposition, and so patient in bearing unjust and unnecessary burdens that the majority leaders and the protected syndicate magnates look upon them now simply as "dumb, driven cattle," fit only to be taxed and expected to vote in accordance with the directions given them through a subsidized press; but, sir, there is a limit to their forbearance, and when the sons of toil do become aroused, then beware of their just wrath and righteous indignation!

Here we have a bill presented, not as class legislation, not to create any monopoly, not oppressive or unduly arbitrary, but a bill to protect the general public as well as the farmer and butter maker.

If this bill was to forbid the manufacture of oleomargarine, if it proposed to place a prohibitory tax upon it, I would vote against the bill; or even if it made butter a favored product, giving it some portion of the protection that other favored products have received, I should then oppose it; but none of these conditions exist. We have laws to-day protecting patented products, trademarks, and such like from imitation and infringement, and public sentiment sustains them. We have laws prohibiting the making of counterfeit money, and the moral sense of the country upholds the laws, and in this bill now before us it is sought to regulate the business of a crowd—a semitrust—that seeks to spread its product under false colors, and at the expense of the butter industry.

Now, let us look at the question plainly. What is it that this bill seeks to do? It is simply this—to prevent the manufacture and sale of an article represented to be butter when it is not butter. It places an internal-revenue tax of 10 cents a pound upon oleomargarine when it is colored up to resemble butter and a tax of only one-fourth of 1 cent per pound upon pure oleomargarine. Is there anything in this that an honest man would object to? If he is a manufacturer he has the benefit of a difference of 9¾ cents to his favor in the cost of having his product ready for the market.

There is no objection on the part of the farmers anywhere to the manufacture of oleomargarine nor to its sale when it is made and sold as such, but when it is made in imitation of butter and exposed for sale behind large signs as "choice butter" then it becomes a competitor, with all the advantages of a smuggler over an honest dealer, and a fraud upon the community.

There is need of legislation on this subject and along the lines laid down in this bill. The committee hearings developed the fact that out of the millions of pounds of oleomargarine made, only about 15 per cent of the product was sold to the consumer as such, the remaining 85 per cent being sold as butter. Now, if the oleomargarine people would sell their product on its merit, as oleomargarine or butterine, then the butter makers would not complain against their competition; but when this mixture of lard, oleo oil, cotton-seed oil, skim milk, and so on, which can be sold at a profit at 8 or 10 cents a pound—when this is offered to the public as butter, then the legitimate butter maker has the right to come and ask that the restraining hand of the law be placed upon such dishonest and unscruplous makers and dealers.

We hear again that there is a trust back of this bill; that there is a creamery trust, a national dairy union trust, and all that; but it is only the old story of the wolf muddying the stream and accusing the lamb of doing it. If there is any trust, it is opposed to this measure. There are but comparatively few people, only a small number of individuals, who are interested in the factories which manufacture oleomargarine, but they have plenty of capital and are combining to control the business and also to fight this bill, which will, if passed, at least prevent them from adding to the immense wealth they have obtained under false pretenses. Yes; back of the opposition to this bill is the cupidity of the few who are seeking to become, or already are, a part of the great oleomargarine trust. [Applause.]

It has been well said that there can be no butter-making trust. The field is too broad for such a combination. From the Atlantic to the Pacific, in every State, especially every State north of Mason and Dixon's line, almost every farmer's family is interested in the manufacture and sale of butter, and these are the people who make up the great framework of our nation.

There is no monopoly in butter making. When in 10,000 homes in every State butter is made, for home consumption and for sale, in the aggregate exceeding many times the product of all the creameries and dairy concerns, there can be no monopoly. The creameries and the largest butter-making establishment in the land can only control a limited market, and you will find that they keep the price of their product above that of the domestic article. No; in the manufacture of butter there can be no great trust organized; but in the manufacture of oleomargarine the possibilities are enormous. There is already a trust in the production of the article, and you all know how rapidly a trust will grow, how it reaches out into all the avenues of its special line and paralyzes every interest that comes into conflict with its own.

The objection of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that this bill would break down a great industry to build up another, while not a valid objection or one that can be sustained, comes with poor grace from such an ardent advocate of laws, tariff laws that have caused the destruction of more interests than one can keep count of, laws by which trusts have been built up, whose grasp has throttled competition, closed out the small producer, and beggared thousands of laborers and workingmen. It is a strange sight—it would be humorous, if the occasion was not so serious—to see this valorous champion of syndicates, trusts, and every corporate combination stand up and hear him bewail the terrible results that will happen to this oleo trust if this law passes and the members of that trust are compelled to sell their product under its right name. He well knows the nature of a trust, knows the methods by which they act.

There is not a member of this body but knows of some instance where by the operation of a trust business has been driven from some city or town, tradesman and manufacturer forced into bankruptcy, shop and factory closed, and many homes ruined. I need not tell you of this. You all know well the gaping, rapacious, never-satisfied maw of the trusts; you recognize their greed, and know in this case that unless we curtail its strength now this oleomargarine trust will soon be preying upon the already well-nigh overburdened farmers. My Ohio colleague must have forgotten his home surroundings, or lost touch with the farmers of Athens County, or realized that the farmers had lost their attachment for him when he aligns himself with the champions of fraud and of a demoralizing industry. I would not for a moment assume or suggest any reason for his attitude other than that this is a case where "Jove is nodding," for the gentleman's love for the farmer is so well known that no other solution fits the case. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] very neatly showed us from the RECORD what my colleague's opinion was of the farmer only a few brief weeks ago, just prior to the organization of the Ohio general assembly: Why, there was nothing too good for the farmer, and the protecting shield of the law should rest above him lest he be imposed upon by "skim-milk cheese," or his flocks be met by the terrible competition of "mixed wool." Here now is an opportunity for him to return to the fold, and prove the sincerity of his desire to better the condition of the agriculturist and protect them from fraudulent and underhanded competition, by supporting this bill.

My Southern friends who are opposing this measure seem to be troubled with a dimness of moral vision. They do not look with their usual clearness into the right and wrong of the question. Cotton-seed oil has cast a film over the retina of their judgment, so that they fail to distinguish honesty and justice, and only behold a possible increased market for their product. Let us examine a little further. This bill does not restrict the legitimate manufacture and sale of oleomargarine as such; it simply prevents its being masqueraded as butter. Now, the friends of oleomargarine, while they are all consumers of butter and prefer it to oleomargarine, claim that it is nutritious, wholesome, and healthy, and will drive poor butter from the market. Then why not let this bill pass and have pure oleomargarine and pure butter meet in fair and open competition in our markets? Then, by all the arguments you advance, oleomargarine ought to hold its own and you would retain your market. But no; the trouble is that the oleomargarine manufacturers and dealers want to pass the article off as choice, pure, unadulterated butter, thereby increasing their sales and enlarging their profits. The whole position and argument of the cotton-seed oil friends is on a par with those who would favor the issuing of counterfeit money because it would open up a market for the product of their paper mills. [Applause.]

I do not know as I can blame my friends from Texas, who oppose this bill, quite so much as I otherwise might, for the cows they raise in that part of the country have no udders. They only have horns, and it is a precious small sight of milk they get out of horns [laughter]; but their arguments seem to me to be far-fetched when they soberly ask, and ask as if they thought the question applied to this bill, "If one industry can be taxed out of existence by the exercise of the taxing power for the benefit of another industry?" Now, although that condition is so far removed from the bill before us as not to have even psychological connection, yet the history of Republican legislation has shown, over and over again, just such a wiping out of industry after industry for a favored few, and such legislation they will continue. In a short time they will present a bill to tax the whole country for the benefit of a few shipowners.

If there is anything in this bill attacking or destroying any industry, then it is an industry based on hypocrisy, adulteration, and fraud, and not a legitimate, respectable business. It does not attack or wipe out even the oleomargarine business; it only so fixes and regulates the business that the dishonest dealer, the violator of law, shall be restrained or feel the penalty for his criminal act.

There is no denial to anyone of the right to buy, sell, or use oleomargarine, if they choose to do so. It does not deny "to the poor man the right to set upon his table a substitute for butter which is attractive in appearance and which does not betray his poverty." There is nothing of the kind in the bill, but it does prevent the unscrupulous dealer from selling any poor man, or any man, oleomargarine when the customer asks for butter and pays for butter.

I am a Democrat, and as such I want our country to be guided by a policy which will look more to our honor and our good name than to the dollar. I want the individual man to prosper and also secure the greatest good to the greatest number, rather than sacrifice everything to the mercenary greed of syndicates, and, above all, having honor, integrity, and truth as guide marks we follow in our national destiny, and in saying this I simply voice Democratic doctrines and principles, and say they are higher and purer than any interpretation which places honor lower than cotton-seed oil, or even the cattle on a thousand hills. [Applause.]

How strangely inconsistent are the arguments presented by the opponents to the bill. Let me read the bill:

A bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine.

Be it enacted, etc., That all articles known as oleomargarine, butterine, imitation butter, or imitation cheese, or any substance in the semblance of butter or cheese not the usual product of the dairy and not made exclusively of pure and unadulterated milk or cream, transported into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon the arrival within the limits of such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such articles or substances had been produced in such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to permit any State to forbid the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in a separate and distinct form and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character, free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like yellow butter.

SEC. 2. That on and after July 1, 1902, the tax on oleomargarine as prescribed in section 8 of the act approved August 2, 1886, and entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," shall be one-fourth of 1 cent per pound when the same is not made in imitation of yellow butter; but when made in imitation of yellow butter the tax to be paid by the manufacturer shall be 10 cents per pound, to be levied and collected in accordance with the provisions of said act.

It is charged on one hand that the bill will kill the oleomargarine business in order to establish a butter monopoly, and then, again, the cry is that the revenue collected will result in the piling up of an enormous surplus in the Treasury. In the first place they say, when oleomargarine is taxed 10 cents a pound, it is such a prohibition tax that the trade can not bear it, but when it is taxed only one-fourth of a cent per pound we will have such an increase in the revenues of the Government that the Treasury will burst with the surplus.

Now, is not that condition of affairs a strong argument in support of the fact that "honesty is the best policy" even in the oleomargarine trade? Why, on the very face of it it seems as though the people engaged in the oleomargarine business ought not to need legislation to make them be good.

As a matter of fact, this is not a revenue bill, nor does it seek to bring in a large income to the Government. It is a restrictive measure, an exercise of the taxing power simply to keep the production of oleomargarine under governmental supervision, that the health and interests of the general public may be best conserved.

But, for argument's sake, let us concede that in its operation the bill will bring in a large revenue, an enormous surplus, will not that be evidence of the fact that this bill does not bear hardly upon the industry, and that the trade is large and remunerative. Then, too, if the apparent present policy of the Administration is to be carried out, there will be plenty of need for a large surplus and a still larger revenue.

Take only one of the "elephants" on our hands at the present time. We have still a war in which we are engaged. With almost the same regularity of English notes of regret announcing defeats in South Africa, so we are told that the war in the Philippines is over, and yet we are continually being called upon for men and means to maintain our authority in isolated towns and stations throughout one or two of the islands of the archipelago. We are told that "we have the Philippines as a prize of war, and we are going to keep them forever."

Even with the employment of native troops as allies Spain was unable to conquer the Philippines in three hundred years. Perhaps we might do it in fifty, at least many of the officers and men who are there fighting think it will take us that long. And think of the expense of keeping an army there that long. Would it not require a large revenue here? It is true that fifty or even ten years of warfare such as we have over there, without quarter, and yet where more men would die from jungle fever than by the lead and steel of the foe, would be a high price to pay for even a group of islands much richer indeed than these.

In addition to these expenses we have the colonial civil government, or satrapy, over there at an expense and on salaries that would not blush when compared with the pay rolls of the steel trust officials. Much as I deplore these conditions, they exist, and show how we have wandered away from the moral standard which we as a nation once held up. We are in the Philippines now only that favored ones may be enriched, their coffers filled by looting, and fat offices given to control influence in high quarters. The course of wisdom and of humanity would have been for us to have kept our plighted faith with the Filipinos and aided them in the maintenance of their established government. Had we done this, we, as a people and a nation, would have had their eternal friendship and gratitude. Treaty rights would have been granted us to any extent we might have desired, and war, with its tears, its agonies, its rivers of blood, and seas of wasted treasure, would not now be raging and drawing from our land our heroic sons. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I deny that this bill is in any way sectional. Wherever there is the owner of a cow, there is a person interested in the bill, and there is no section of the country where cows are not owned and kept. Wherever there is a person who is opposed to adulteration, fraud, and deceit, there you will find a man who is interested in and favors the passage of this bill. I stand here favoring this bill and represent no corporate monopoly, no greedy trust, but the sturdy and honest citizen, who asks that we favor the maintenance of the good old-fashioned ideas of morality and fair dealing and look less to wealth than to character and place man above the dollar. [Applause.]

This is not, primarily, a partisan question, and only becomes one as it conflicts with the interests of trusts, which are notoriously under the sheltering care of the Republican party.

It is true that it is a protection measure, but it is the protection of an honest industry and an honest article against the assault of a trust and against an imitation, a hypocritical, a deceitful production. It is the protection of the homes of the land, North and South, East and West, from the sordid, grasping power of a piratical trust sailing under false colors, and all true men should cast aside self-interest and blind adherence to trust dictation and honestly and fearlessly support this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. NEVILLE. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee I desire to yield twenty minutes to my colleague from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted to me I shall not attempt to go into any lengthy discussion of the legal phases of the oleomargarine business, because that topic has already been thoroughly gone over by gentlemen who are better qualified to pass upon it than I am. I will content myself with the general proposition that we can not go far wrong in the equities of this case if we shall in all honesty and candor endeavor to find what is the real public evil in the situation, and, having determined that, we shall with equal honesty endeavor to find a remedy which shall be at once effectual as well as legal.

I believe it has been generally admitted in the discussion of the subject upon this floor that there is a certain element of fraud that enters into the oleomargarine business at some point in the production or sale of that commodity, and also, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the same thing was quite generally admitted before the committee in the testimony at the hearings held by it. In support of this statement I want to quote a portion of the testimony of one of the gentlemen who, as I understand, appeared on behalf of the oleomargarine factories in this city. Quoting from the testimony of Mr. Scott, of Pennsylvania, he says:

> The genius which succeeded by the application of chemical fluids and compounds in transforming a mass of loathsome and unwholesome ingredients into an article of food at a trifling cost does not hesitate to impose the product upon the public and receive in the way of excessive profit the difference between the cost of the imitation or counterfeit article and that of pure butter.

Mr. Chairman, I also wish to quote from a summary of the report of our Industrial Commission which has just been given to the public press. I find in a portion of that report, referring to pure-food products, the following recommendation:

> It is recommended that a pure-food section in the chemistry division in the Department of Agriculture be established to prevent adulterations and false branding and deceptive imitations of food.

Now, this recommendation, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, plainly indicates that in the opinion of this Industrial Commission there are false brandings and deceptive imitations of food being made in this country which are inimical to the public welfare. I think I may go further and say that the oleomargarine business was originally predicated upon fraud. It had its origin in the fact that some crafty chemist discovered that from certain by-products in the packing-house industry, which heretofore had had but little value, he could produce a compound that when colored like butter and pressed into attractive rolls or prints could be sold upon the market at an enormous profit. I am opposed to the perpetration of fraud upon the public, and especially when that fraud is productive of profit to the promoters and at the expense of a legitimate industry.

Further, Mr. Chairman, what is the object proposed to be attained by these two bills which are before the committee for consideration? What do both of them profess to do? Certainly the aim of both is to make impossible the fraud that at present exists in this industry. What convinces me that the majority bill will be effectual is because it makes it profitable for the manufacturer to encourage and build up an honest industry.

There is an old adage, Mr. Chairman, to which we are frequently referred, and that is that "honesty is the best policy;" and I believe that the universal experience of mankind will demonstrate the general truth of this maxim. Yet, strange as it may seem, it sometimes takes the enactment of a legal statute to convince certain gentlemen in business of the truth of that proposition.

There is another recently coined phrase that we often hear used at this time, and that is that "trade follows the flag." That trade does always follow the flag may be a question open to dispute; but I believe it will be generally admitted that trade does follow profit, and because the majority bill puts a profit upon the side of the manufacturer who produces a compound that must be sold for what it really is, and takes profit away from him who produces a product whose chief value and sale upon the market depends largely upon the fact that it may deceive the public, I believe that the majority bill will have a practical value as a preventive of fraud.

Further, Mr. Chairman, it was brought out in the testimony before the committee, I believe, that the principal features of the minority bill—that is, providing fines and penalties when fraud is proven—have already been enacted into legislation by thirty-two of the forty-five States of this Union, and it was also admitted before that committee, I think by every person who testified, that legislation along this line to regulate the business has failed in every State in which it has been tried.

I submit in all honesty and candor, if we are in earnest in this attempt to drive the fraud out of the oleomargarine business, why not go right to the thing that underlies and supports the fraud, and remove that support; lay the ax at the very root of the evil and see if the fraud will not then fall for want of support.

The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], who has preceded me, quoted a little from the Merchant of Venice to illustrate his point, and I hope I may be pardoned if I illustrate my meaning also in the same way. You will remember, Mr. Chairman, in that great scene in the Merchant of Venice where Shylock is upon trial before the duke, for wanting to cut a pound of flesh from nearest the heart of the merchant Antonio, and the duke convicts him and sentences him to death, and then at the appeal of Portia he pardons him but condemns him to the loss of all his lands and wealth, and sends the old man penniless from the door, then the old man turns to the duke and says: "No, rather take my life; for you do take my life when you do take the means whereby I live."

And the only way that you will take the life of the fraud in the oleomargarine business is to take from it the means whereby it lives, and that is the right of the manufacturer to give to his concocted compound a color that nature herself mixes in the product of the cow, and is the one most distinguishing feature by which that product has been known for two thousand years as the very hall-mark of its genuineness.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Upon that question, Is it right that you should color renovated butter? If it is wrong to color one kind, why is it right to color the other kind?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say to the gentleman that I do not defend any attempts at fraudulent practices with any other food product. I say now that I am ready to support any legislation that will eliminate any fraud that there may be in the butter business as well as to support that which will eliminate fraud from the oleomargarine business.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to discuss further this side of the question. I freely admit that the side of the question which appeals most closely to me is that of the man and the farmer who produces the cattle and the milk, which are alike essential to the oleomargarine and to the dairy industry. I find that the packing house and butter producers were represented very ably before the Agricultural Committee, and their interests have been defended ably upon this floor; but there is another who stands behind them both and supports them both, and that is the farmer, the man behind the cow. I know that he does not cut so heroic a figure in history as the man behind the gun, but he is just as essential to the continued prosperity and perpetuity of this country.

I remember that in a colloquy between the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] the other day the question was raised as to whether there was any industrial interest represented before that committee. And at least by inference the gentleman from Kansas stated that there was not. I wish to read here a portion of the speech in which the gentleman from Texas interrogated him:

Mr. BURLESON. Right on that point, will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it not a fact that hundreds of protests were received by the committee from labor organizations from one end of the country to the other, protesting against this legislation upon the ground that they were the consumers of oleomargarine and would be affected thereby?

And the gentleman from Kansas said:

Such protests, representing in the aggregate many thousand laboring men, were received during the last Congress and have been published in the hearings that were given before the committees during the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I find upon examination of the testimony before this committee that there was a representative of one class of labor in this country, and a very numerous class in a certain industry, and I shall read to the House a part of the statement of the president of the Women's Industrial and Patriotic League, who testified before the committee. This witness, Mr. Chairman, testified before the committee, and it is not disputed that she was a representative of industrial women, who are largely consumers as well as producers of butter and butterine. What does she say?

Not until man became a butter manufacturer was imitation of butter placed upon the market. Butterine was unknown to women, who are generally honest and opposed to adulterated food products.

I do not believe that there is a gentleman on the floor who will dispute that. And then she states further:

The pretty dairymaid is a creature of the past. Man, the adulterator of food products, has usurped the place once occupied by women who made pure butter for the markets of the world. Behold the result of man's butter making. We are a nation of dyspeptics because of the poisonous compounds used and forced upon the market. There was a time in the history of our country when it was the pride of every woman to be a good housekeeper, and the farmers' daughters must be good butter makers, that they might make eligible matches. But this is all a thing of the past.

* * * * * * *

Therefore, the decline in pure butter products has also affected the matrimonial market, for matrimony has declined 60 per cent in the States of New York and Massachusetts alone by bachelors who are able to maintain and support wives and families. Thirty-two per cent of the nonmarrying men reside in the country and rural districts. I attribute this decrease in matrimony by farmers largely because women are no longer a necessary adjunct to the farmer lads to help them create wealth, owing to the existence of the oleo-cotton-oil-soap-fat combine, which has thus deprived many women and girls of legal providers, and 40,000,000 people of pure cow butter in this country alone.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to this distinguished Representative from the State of Texas, representing, as he does, the beauty and chivalry of that great State, to come out from behind his buckskin long-horned Texas steer and come over with us upon the side of the gentle American cow and the American housewife and the American farmer's rosy-cheeked daughter. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is a broader field to this question, and that is its effect upon our general live-stock interests and the continued prosperity of this country.

Mr. Chairman, of the various branches of our agricultural wealth which contribute to the prosperity of the farmer the live-stock industry is the most profitable. And of the various branches of the live-stock business the one that extends over the entire country—from East to West, from North to South—is what is commonly known as the cattle industry. Because of climate and other conditions the growing of sheep is confined to certain localities; the growing of horses and mules for the market is confined to another, and, as we all know, hogs and corn are twin essentials of a common industry, and are both largely confined to what is known as the corn belt.

But, Mr. Chairman, the American cow is just as useful and just as profitable, if she is handled intelligently, in New England as she is in California, or in the Mississippi Valley, or in Texas, or the Dakotas. The total value of our neat cattle now approaches approximately the enormous sum of $1,500,000,000 and extending over every one of the 45 States and the Territories, and is one of the pillars which support our foreign commerce.

The twentieth century confronts the cattle producers with new conditions, which they must be prepared to meet. We are still the greatest producers of beef in the world. But, Mr. Chairman, this cattle industry is rapidly changing. The great ranges in the West and the Southwest—the great reservoirs from which we have drawn our principal supplies of beef cattle—are rapidly passing away, for two reasons. First, the onward march of the Western settler is rapidly breaking them up into small private holdings, and second, because of the consequent overstocking of the ranges yet left in the West with sheep and cattle these ranges have been eaten down to the very ground. The exposure of the grass roots to the sun and the wind in that dry climate has destroyed the grasses and has made many of them practically deserts; and, as our Agricultural Department has wisely indicated, one of the great problems of the future is the reseeding and reproduction of grasses upon those portions of the arid West that can never be anything further than grazing grounds.

Now, upon that subject I wish to quote from the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture, so practical as he is upon every subject upon which he touches that is essential to our agricultural population:

Now, then, the tendency in the South, where they have destroyed the lands by perpetual cropping, and the tendency west of the Missouri, in the semidry belt, where they are destroying the grazing lands by injudicious overgrazing, is to take a greater interest in the dairy cow than in the steer, and in the case of settlers who want to raise families out west of the one hundredth meridian the interest grows every day on behalf of the dairy cow, and with regard to the production of steers east of the Missouri River on the farms, there is no comparison whatever. The small amount of cattle that commerce calls for in making oleomargarine is infinitesimal in value compared with the injury that the growth of this bogus industry will inflict upon legitimate agriculture, that requires a dairy cow.

In support of my position that the cattle-producing supremacy and wealth in cattle holdings is rapidly passing to those States that are developing the value of the milk products of their cattle, I have collected a few figures from the advanced report of the Census Bureau.

Now, I want to quote from the figures of the Census Department, showing eight States that are to-day the greatest holders in cattle and which have produced the most material wealth. The first State is the great State of Texas, an empire in itself. The conditions are so peculiar in Texas that we have to study that case by itself.

Texas is so vast in its domain that as yet the home builders have had to encroach but little upon the ranges, and yet in Texas already many of the great ranges are being broken up into small ranches. The X I T ranch of the so-called Panhandle region has lately been put upon the market and sold into small ranches, and eventually Texas will be so covered with small farms that she will become in wealth and population what she now is in domain—the Empire State of the Union.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman allow me to say that the large ranches of Texas are only fit for raising beef; can never be used for agricultural or dairy purposes. The principal industry there is the cattle-raising business—the raising of beef.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have already admitted that the State of Texas has peculiar conditions confronting it, because of its enormous extent, and that different portions of the State are subject to different climatic conditions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the second State in the Union in the extent of its cattle holding is a State of only one-eighth of the size of Texas—the State of Iowa—the smallest in dimensions of the ten States to which I have referred. That State, during the last ten years, under the intensive style of cattle raising, depending not only upon the value of the beef but also upon the value of the milk and butter as necessary incidents to maintaining her cattle, has added 471,299 head of cattle to her holdings. Illinois within the same period has added only 35,411. Kansas has added 1,307,010, standing third in the list of cattle-holding States.

Minnesota, a State where cattle are maintained for a dual purpose—the production of both milk and beef—has added 515,846 head of cattle to her herds in the ten years that are passed; Missouri, largely a beef-producing State, has added but 17,770 head to her herds in the ten years; Wisconsin, another great dairy State, has increased hers by 776,507, and Nebraska, the youngest State among the entire eight which I have mentioned, and with the smallest population of any of them, yet with the highest educational standard and the lowest percentage of illiteracy among her people of any State in the Union, as is shown by this same census; Nebraska, a State whose farming community is not excelled in intelligence by that of any country on earth, has, by her thrifty farmers turning their attention to the problem of maintaining their cattle in small herds, and which can only be done at a profit to the husbandman, and all the sources of profit in the industry are realized upon, has increased her herds of cattle 1,037,610 head in the decade just past, the largest percentage of increase in the number of cattle held shown by any State under our flag.

These eight States which I have mentioned, and in seven of which the value of the milk products has become absolutely essential to the support of the herds, have within their borders nearly 33,000,000 head of cattle, or practically one-half of all the cattle in the entire United States, showing conclusively, in my judgment, that our continued prosperity as a beef and cattle producing nation depends upon maintaining to the farmer an undebauched market for the sale of the milk products of his cattle.

These same States are also the greatest sources for our beef supplies, and in practically three-fourths of the other States in the Union and which hold two-thirds of the balance of the cattle in the country the cattle industry could not possibly live without the profit derived from the sale of the milk and the products derived from it.

In the Great Plains region east of the Rocky Mountains, where formerly the steer, the coyote, and the buffalo ranged side by side, there lives to-day a population of 10,000,000 of energetic and progressive American citizens, essentially home builders and small farmers. It is a purely agricultural region and always will remain so. The large ranches disappeared before this tide of immigration and civilization, and the enterprising American farmer has had to wrestle with the proposition of the production of his beef and the maintenance of his cattle upon expensive grains and forages raised by his own toil, instead of the free range grasses of the prairies. Practical experience has proven that only where grass is cheap and abundant can the growing of cattle be profitably maintained if the one source of profit is in the production of beef. While the value of the offspring of the cow is estimated at about one-third of her value for each year of its growth, the value of her milk product, which requires the labor of the farmer and his family in its production, is estimated to be double that of the value of the animal itself.

The milk and butter industry has become fundamental, with the beef product as a secondary consideration and corollary thereto.

There is another point that I wish to touch upon that is raised several times during this discussion, especially by the members representing large cities and whose constituents are consumers of butter. These gentlemen have asked what value there can be in this majority bill to the producers of butter if it does not enhance the price thereof? Its value lies in this: That it will enable the producers of butter to work out in their line of industry what has become the most pronounced feature in all successful lines of business development in this country, and which has demonstrated that it is not by high prices that great business profits are now built up, but by increasing the volume of business; that increased consumption and not increase in prices will produce the largest volume of profit. Practically every large and successful industry in this country has been developed upon this principle.

Every great department store illustrates it; our modern merchant princes have built up their fortunes because they have come to realize it. The greatest industrial organizations of capital in this country, those which are the producers of staple products in manufacture, owe their wonderful and enormous profits that they have directed their lines of energy toward producing enormous sales by the reduction of the price to the consumer as the principal means whereby this end might be accomplished. If the volume of real butter sold and consumed in this country could be doubled, the producers of butter could sell their product at a much lower price to the consumer and yet enormously increase their own profit on the product. It is not by the profit on the individual sale, but by the profit on the enormity of the total output that the modern manufacturer and dealer realizes large returns in his business.

We shall do well, Mr. Chairman, to consider with great care the interest of the small farmer in our action upon this bill—the man who, by honest toil and by the aid of his thrifty family, builds up a modest competency to maintain that family and educate his children, and who enters so largely into the great totality both of our population and our wealth.

We love to boast of the wealth and riches of this great nation, now far exceeding that of any other nation upon earth, amounting, according to the census of 1900, to over $80,000,000,000. We have the most wonderful mining wealth, great manufactories, great cities, and great railroads, yet the wealth of the soil and the products of the farm, which the farmer wrings from it by honest toil, exceeds the wealth of all other branches of industry combined. We like to boast, also, of our great balance of trade that has grown so great in the last few years that it at once staggers and terrifies the rest of the world. This balance of trade has made possible our most unexampled prosperity and has added $500,000,000 of gold to our stock of money in circulation in five years.

It has now reached the enormous sum of $1,100,000,000 of money, even enough to buy a modern trust, yet of all this enormous balance, so essential to the continued prosperity of this country, practically two-thirds of it, more than $800,000,000, is the result of the farmer's toil. He is heard of but little in matters of legislation, but he has always been ready to support the nation's honor or credit in time of need. No matter how much you of the cities may boast of your wonderful growth and prosperity, it is all yet dependent upon the prosperity of the farmer—the man behind the cow, if you please. Speculators and promoters of water-soaked and wind-blown corporations will bring panics and disasters upon this country in the future as they have in the past, and after the storm has passed by the farmer will go to work once more to build up the credit which others have pulled down.

Upon the prosperity of our great cattle industry depends the prosperity of our great agricultural army—the men who go out in the spring and harrow over the broad bosom of mother earth and draw from it in sunshine and rain the wealth which nature has so generously stored there for man's use. This is an agricultural country, and will be for generations to come. Our supremacy as an exporting nation depends upon our ability to maintain our supremacy as an exporter of agricultural products.

With the credit of this nation now expanded to an extent never before known in all our history of the past; with every dollar of our money rushing through the avenues and veins of commerce in effort to maintain undiminished this great flood tide of our prosperity and our trade, the continued prosperity of the man who tills the soil has become the very foundation rock upon which our entire business fabric rests, and which once shattered will shake this great industrial, commercial, and wealth-producing nation to its very center. [Applause.]

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this measure is to elevate the price of a product of a small number of producers to the great detriment of a very much larger number of consumers. The Government should prohibit the manufacture and sale of a product intended for human diet deleterious to health. This has been done by an act of Congress which compels the manufacturer of oleomargarine to disclose all material that constitute such manufacture, and it is claimed in consequence of this law that the oleomargarine manufactured in this country is wholesome food.

The Government has also assumed to tax this product and to compel manufacturers to stamp the product, so that the jobber, retailer, and consumer may know its character. Beyond this we should not go. When I was a boy upon my father's farm in Vermont, and milked the cows and assisted my mother in skimming the milk, churning the cream, and making the butter, I remember that in the spring, when the cows were feeding upon old hay and the butter was white, I used to grind up carrots and extract the carrot juice and mix it with the butter, so as to make it look like fresh grass butter. This was done to meet the æsthetic tastes of the Bostonians to whom my father sold the butter. This is being done in all the creameries of our country. Why should we take from the consumer the right to have a wholesome food like butterine or oleomargarine colored like butter? When the Government undertakes to control the manufacture of a product for human diet, and by proper laws compels all producers to eliminate from the manufacture thereof everything deleterious to health, and produces a wholesome article of food, and informs the consumer by a stamp regulation what it is, the duty of the Government has been performed; and class legislation like the measure proposed should not be permitted.

I am credibly informed that out in Iowa they have a manufacturing institution producing every year from corn and other materials more sirup, which they sell upon the market as Vermont maple sirup, than is gathered from all the maple trees in this country. They make it to look like Vermont maple sirup and to taste like Vermont maple sirup and even smell like Vermont maple sirup. Why not stop this manufacture and give to the farmers the benefit of a like protection to the producers of real maple sirup? The next step after the enactment of this measure will be an army of special agents going about the country at the expense of the people looking for harmful colors in food products. The army of such special agents is already too large. This measure is unwise and should be defeated.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, at this late hour in the discussion of this question I hesitate somewhat to take up the time of the House. But the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] has just interjected a new argument into the discussion. He has appealed to our chivalry, to our hopes for the growth and population of our country by the argument that the oleomargarine industry discouraged matrimony and jeopardized the occupation of the dairy maid. Now, Mr. Chairman, if that be true, it is a forceful argument for the bill, and it behooves all those who expect to vote against it to give good reason to the House for the conviction that is within them and some very sound arguments why the bill should not become a law.

Mr. Chairman, to me the introduction of this measure marks an epoch in the legislation of this country. We have reached that stage in the history of legislation when there is unblushingly presented for our consideration a measure which, in the confident hope and expectation of its friends and sponsors, will either absolutely destroy or seriously cripple a legitimate industry, and this unlawful purpose is attempted to be concealed under the guise of a revenue measure. Not content with this, the friends of the bill propose and contemplate in the third section a meddlesome, inquisitorial, and tyrannical nosing about by the officers of the Government into the kitchens and pantries of the nation. Mr. Chairman, it would be beyond all comprehension——

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. This measure simply reenacts the present law, the law of 1886. There is no new feature in it.

Mr. MONDELL. There is nothing in the present law which would justify the agent of the Revenue Department to invade the kitchens of the country to discover whether or not a boarding-house keeper, having purchased uncolored oleomargarine, colored it for the use of her boarders. It is just that sort of petty tyranny that this bill authorizes, though I am not surprised the gentleman hesitates to admit it.

This bill attempts to disguise all of its inquisitorial and tyrannical provisions. They are thinly veiled, but they are here nevertheless.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it would be incomprehensible how ordinarily well-meaning, honest, broad-minded, liberty-loving gentlemen could bring themselves to support legislation of this character, if it were not for the fact that history furnishes us with countless examples of how, under the unconscious seductions of considerations of political self-preservation and a sophistry which confuses regulation and repression, equally honest gentlemen have ofttimes in the past brought themselves to believe that they were justified in enacting repressive and class legislation. I do not imagine that when the present law was passed there was a gentleman in the House who would have admitted that any conditions could arise which would justify the legislation now before us. But so it always has been with this class of legislation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow an interruption right there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state for his information that the bill which passed the House in 1886 provided for a tax of 10 cents a pound on oleomargarine, just as is now proposed by the bill under consideration.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, so much the worse for that legislation. It did not become a law at any rate, so that it is evident that somewhere in the Congress of the United States there were people who did not believe legislation similar to that now before us was justified or justifiable.

But I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that it has always been thus with legislation of this character, with sumptuary legislation. Once let the seeds of error enter men's minds, once let the idea get abroad that there can be any justification of legislation which will aid one industry at the expense of another, let there be just a grain of fraud, real or fancied, as a balm for smarting conscience and a ground for specious arguments, and there is no limit to the repressive and tyrannical legislation that men will persuade themselves is justifiable.

The gentlemen tell us that this legislation is intended to prevent fraud, when the legislation upon its very face is a fraud. It comes here under as false a color as the moonbeam-tinted December butter upon which the friends and sponsors of the bill propose to place the royal prerogative of a golden hue. [Applause.] It is brought here as a revenue measure; and still not a man on the floor of the House, least of all the friends of the measure, hope or expect that it will produce any revenue. Those who have most urgently pressed its passage expect that it will destroy an industry, if we are to take them at their word.

Mr. Adams, pure food commissioner of the State of Wisconsin, in his testimony before the committee on March 7, 1900, said:

> There is no use beating about the bush in this matter. We want to pass this law and drive the oleomargarine manufacturers out of the business.

Charles Y. Knight, secretary of the National Dairy Union, in a letter to the Virginia Dairyman, dated May 18, 1900, writes:

> Now is the time for you to clip the fangs of the mighty octopus of the oleomargarine manufacturers who are ruining the dairy interests of this country by manufacturing and selling in defiance of law a spurious article in imitation of pure butter. We have a remedy almost in grasp which will eliminate the manufacture of this article from the food-product list. The Grout bill, now pending in the Agricultural Committee of the House of Representatives in Congress, meets the demand.

W. D. Hoard, ex-governor of Wisconsin and president of the National Dairy Union, stated in his testimony before the committee on March 7, 1900, as follows:

> To give added force to the first section of the bill, it is provided in the second section that a tax of 10 cents a pound shall be imposed on all oleomargarine in the color or semblance of butter. In plain words, this is repressive taxation.

And on January 13, 1902, in his testimony before the Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, the same witness, replying to the question as to "whether this bill (H. R. 9206—or similar measure) would be demanded if, after its passage, just as much oleomargarine would be manufactured and put on the market as is now manufactured and sold," said:

> In that case, sir, I would come before Congress and demand a still higher tax.

But the gentlemen say they do not wish to stamp out an industry, but that they do wish to prevent fraud; and still there is not a line or a syllable in the measure brought before the House that by any possibility can prevent fraud unless in doing so it absolutely puts an end to a legitimate industry. There is no fraud in the manufacture of colored oleomargarine. If there be a fraud in the manufacture of that article, how do the gentlemen of the committee justify themselves in attempting to put an end to the fraud in the factory and in the retail store and encourage the fraud within the sacred precincts of the home? for under the provisions of the bill a man may at his own fireside color oleomargarine, and that shall be no fraud; but should he happen to place some of the article so colored before a chance boarder he commits a heinous crime.

Now, there is not a gentleman on the floor of the House who does not understand that there can be no fraud in the manufacture of this article colored as butter. Selling oleomargarine for that which it is not is a fraud and should be punished, and in the minority bill an honest effort is made to devise means to stamp out the fraud without attempting to ruthlessly stamp out an industry.

I deny that oleomargarine is generally colored for the purpose of misleading or defrauding. It is colored for the same reason that most butter is colored. The butter of June, as one gentleman has poetically described it, as the product of the wedding of the sunshine and the luscious grasses of that beautiful month, is of a golden hue. It is the best product of the dairy. It is the most palatable, it is in every way the most satisfactory product. And as the eye and the palate of men for countless generations have come to accept the color of June butter as a criterion of the best product, so the manufacturers of butter the year round have sought to color the butter made in other months the same color as the butter of June; not with the idea of misleading the consumer into supposing that he is eating June butter in December, but in order to present to him an article which his palate and his eye accept as having the appearance of the best product of the dairy.

And so when the manufacturers of oleomargarine proceed to the manufacture of an article which is a substitute for butter he very naturally, properly, and legitimately, and lawfully colors it the same color that the farmers and the dairymen color the butter of other months than June.

Now, if the gentlemen who support the majority bill are so anxious to stamp out fraud, there would have been some provision in their bill which would have stamped out the fraud without putting an end to an industry. I regret that I can not agree with the gentleman from Ohio in the belief that this legislation will not absolutely destroy the oleomargarine industry. I believe it will. I believe that the gentlemen who bring this bill into the House have wrought better than they knew, or knew better than the interpretation they placed on the measure when they presented it to us, because, if I read correctly the last paragraph of section 2, it positively and absolutely prohibits the manufacture of the article commonly known as oleomargarine.

The ingredients of that article are well known. According to a report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, May 14, 1900, the following are the ingredients used in the production of oleomargarine in the United States and the percentage of each:

	Per cent.		Per cent.
Neutral lard	34.37	Stearin	0.07
Oleo oil	26.82	Glucose	.03
Cotton-seed oil	4.77	Milk	15.55
Sesame	.53	Salt	7.42
Coloring matter	.16	Butter oil	1.76
Sugar	.12	Butter	1.72
Glycerin	.01	Cream	3.86

It will be noticed that of the ingredients 22.89 per cent are butter, milk, and cream. Without these ingredients the article known as oleomargarine can not be manufactured, can not be churned, will not have the grain and appearance of butter, will not have the taste of butter, to say nothing of the color of butter. Now, under the provisions of this second section no article can be used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, except it pay the tax of 10 cents a pound, which "causes it to look like butter." Well, these are the articles that make it look like butter, that give it the grain of butter, that give it the taste of butter, that make it a substitute for butter, and under this legislation, in my opinion, these ingredients can not be used, and therefore if any article can be manufactured and sold as oleomargarine without paying the tax it will be a compound of oleo oil and neutral lard that will not have the appearance, the grain, nor the taste of butter, even white butter, and therefore will be unsalable as a substitute for butter.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. MONDELL. And as an article of manufacture oleomargarine will be entirely prohibited.

Mr. KLEBERG. I entirely agree with the gentleman, and the section provides that same prohibition.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes, sir. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Before the gentleman proceeds, will he yield to a question? Can the gentleman give any explanation of the difference in the meaning of the language which is used where it "looks like butter" and that "made in imitation of butter?" The section following the one the gentleman has just referred to uses the expression "when made in imitation of butter." Is there any distinction in that language?

Mr. MONDELL. I think there is little distinction, Mr. Chairman; I think the use of either phraseology will prohibit the manufacture of oleomargarine, even of white oleomargarine, because oleomargarine as a substitute for butter is made in imitation of butter. No one denies that; and it is legitimate to make oleomargarine in imitation of butter, not for the purpose of selling it as butter, but for the purpose of providing a cheap and wholesome article which will take the place of butter on the tables of those who are not able to stand the cost of high-priced butter. [Applause.] If it can not in the future be manufactured of the ingredients I have referred to (butter, milk, and cream), which give it the grain and flavor of butter, unless it pay the 10-cent tax (and I hold that under the bill it can not), then you have destroyed the industry.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman state whether or not oleomargarine is used in any other way except as a substitute for butter?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is a hard question.

Mr. MONDELL. Why, I do not know of all the uses of oleomargarine. I know oleomargarine is used as a substitute for butter by those who know what it is, by those who buy it for what it is, by those who buy it because it is a good, healthful, and cheap product, by those who buy it on account of its superior keeping qualities over the best creamery butter.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman refer to the section following the one which he has just quoted, wherein it provides that oleomargarine, when not made in imitation of butter, shall be taxed one-fourth of 1 cent, but when made in imitation of butter 10 cents a pound? Will not that, in the judgment of the gentleman, fix a definite tax on all oleomargarine at 10 cents a pound, for the reason that it can not be made in any other way except in imitation of butter?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is true.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Then will not that, in a larger measure than the question of any ingredients, stamp out that industry by a prohibitive tax?

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman for further light in the matter. There are so many infamous things in the bill that no one gentleman on this floor could by any possibility have time enough to find them all. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, they say to us that the farmers of the country are demanding this legislation. The gentleman from Nebraska, however, has just stated that the farmers had not been heard from in the hearings on this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I have the highest regard for the farmers of this nation. I believe they are the bone and the sinew and the hope of the nation, that in the future as in the past there shall come from the farms of America the men who shall control her destinies, civil, religious, and economical. And it is because I have so high a regard for the American farmer, because I believe so thoroughly in his love of fair play, in his adherence and devotion to the principles upon which our Government is founded that I do not believe the farmers of the nation, now or any time in the past, have demanded legislation fundamentally wrong. I do not believe that when this legislation is understood by the farmers of the nation, when it is laid bare to them in all its vicious nakedness, that they will be favorable to it or that they are now favorable to it. I believe they will punish the men who in their name propose to commit this crime against the principles of personal liberty and equal opportunity. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I thought I had thirty minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had twenty minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, general debate closes at 5 o'clock, and there are a number of other gentlemen who wish to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wyoming may be extended ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if there is practically any such thing as oleomargarine not in imitation of butter?

Mr. MONDELL. There is no such thing, and there can not be. The whole intent, object, and effect of the bill will be to stamp out the oleomargarine industry.

Mr. SIMS. It can not stand the 10 per cent tax?

Mr. MONDELL. It will not and can not stand the 10 per cent tax.

Mr. THAYER. I understood the gentleman from Wyoming to say that if this bill of the majority went into effect it would absolutely prohibit the manufacture of oleomargarine because certain articles which he enumerated went into the composition. I do not understand——

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I have only ten minutes, and I can not give the gentleman time to make a speech.

Mr. Chairman, it is well understood that the creamery trust, so called, is in favor of this measure. Having obtained control, practically, of all the creamery and dairy butter in the country, all not manufactured on the farms, they now seek legislation which will destroy a dangerous rival. It is a remarkable fact to me, in view of the insistence by members here that the farmers of the country are all in favor of this measure, that it has been deemed necessary to have so powerful a lobby exerting its influence on members here to secure this legislation.

There is scarcely a man on this floor that does not represent to a greater or less extent a farmer constituency. There is not a man on the floor that does not have a high regard for that constituency. There is not a man here that is not anxious to to do all that he legitimately can for the interest of that constituency. And yet, in spite of that fact, in spite of the fact that the farmer is more generally represented on the floor of Congress than any other class of American citizens, when a bill is brought here which is claimed primarily to be in the interest of the farmer, gentlemen seem to consider it necessary to bring here a lobby to influence members the like of which I have never seen since I have been a member of this body. It seems to me that the necessity for that sort of thing is condemnation of the measure itself, and proof that it is not the farmer himself, but a selfish interest in his name that is clamoring for this legislation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the laboring men of the country use this article. The clerk on a small salary uses this article; the farmers themselves who sell their milk to the creameries, as has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio, use this product. They understand it to be a healthy article of food, a palatable article of food. It certainly is—and still this Congress says to these men, "You can not use this healthful, palatable article of food; you can not have this palatable article of food placed before you because there is a certain industry in the country that demands that there shall be an end put to its manufacture."

Gentlemen come in here and say that they are legislating in favor of the poor man. In what way, pray? Because they propose by this legislation to allow him to use a nauseous, unpalatable compound of natural lard and oleo oil in place of oleomargarine, if he sees fit to use it, with a tax of only one-fourth of a cent per pound, knowing full well that that article can not and will not be used.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the name of fair play, in the name of justice as against repressive legislation, I hope that this bill may be voted down. It is the history of throwbacks, not only in legislation, but in nature, that they generally go back to the most repulsive and primitive form. And no repressive legislation ever promulgated by the edict of the Czar of all the Russias was more iniquitous than the legislation we are now asked to vote for. [Applause.]

In a measure that is wrong in principle and cloaked in a false pretense, as this is, no portion is free of objection, but the last paragraph of section 2 is the bright peculiar gem of its iniquities. This paragraph, as I have already pointed out, would not only practically prohibit, as would also section 3, as has been pointed out by the gentleman from Indiana, the manufacture of oleomargarine, either white or colored, as the prohibitive 10-cent tax would apply to oleomargarine as now manufactured even though not colored, but, worse than all, it contemplates a meddlesome and inquisitorial prying into the affairs of private citizens such as has never been contemplated by an American legislative body.

What an elevating and edifying spectacle would be presented under the provisions of that section when the Paul Prys and sleuths of the Internal-Revenue Department invaded the kitchens of the boarding houses of the land to discover whether or no some poor widow might not be buying white oleomargarine and then coloring it herself for her boarders, and if it were discovered that she were guilty of this heinous crime, even though the boarders aforesaid might be fully informed of and perfectly satisfied with the coloring operation, the widow could be forthwith dragged to the bastile and subjected to the pains and penalties of manufacturing oleomargarine without a license. What a joy it is to contemplate the possibility and probability of this sort of thing under this legislation. I suppose after the bill is passed the gentlemen who are urging its passage will be presenting candidates as collectors of internal revenue for this new and hugely edifying service. I have no doubt but what they will be able to find gentlemen who are favorable to this kind of legislation and who would have the proper stomach for this sort of petty tyranny.

The bill presented by the minority of the committee is a measure calculated to prevent frauds in the sale of oleomargarine, and would, in my opinion, have that effect. Under its provisions oleomargarine could only be sold in 1 and 2 pound packages, stamped, wrapped in paper properly marked, and bound about with an internal-revenue stamp. I believe it would be practically impossible to practice a fraud under the provisions of this bill. If it became a law, oleomargarine would be sold for what it is, and as it is now universally recognized by the highest medical authorities the world over to be a pure and wholesome and nutritious product it is entitled to the same consideration that any other healthful food product is; sold for what it is, those who desire it could use it. A great majority of people would of course still prefer butter, but in seasons and localities when butter was high many people of small income would undoubtedly use oleomargarine. Every consideration of justice and fair play recommends the passage of the bill of the minority. The selfish interests who wish to have a legitimate industry stamped out naturally favor the majority bill, and no doubt some good men have brought themselves to believe that they were justified in voting for the majority bill as the only way of preventing fraud, but even if it were true that only in this way could fraud be prevented I do not believe that would justify the passage of the bill. I do believe, however, that the minority bill will prevent fraud and still give the people an opportunity to buy a cheap, wholesome, and nutritious article of food. [Applause.]

[Mr. DAHLE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, at this late hour of this debate I can not hope to add much, if anything new to the discussion, but believing the principle involved in the pending measure to be bad, if not vicious, I desire to state in the brief time at my disposal some of the objections to it, without attempting any detailed argument in support of them.

The majority of the committee, in their report favorably commending this bill to the House, took occasion to refer to it as drastic legislation. A reading of the bill justifies this reference, but a reading of the majority report utterly fails, in my humble opinion, to justify the enactment of any such drastic legislation.

Before undertaking remedial legislation of any kind it is always wise to follow the old maxim of the common law, and look first to the old law and then to the evil that needs to be remedied. Armed with the information thus obtained, we can the better determine the proper remedy to apply.

Pursuing this course in this case, we find on our statute books now a law to prohibit oleomargarine from being sold as butter and a law that, in its provisions and requirements, appears to me to be drastic enough to satisfy the most ultra of the butter makers.

This law gives a legal definition to the word "butter" and to the word "oleomargarine," and provides that the manufacturer of as well as the wholesale and retail dealers in oleomargarine shall each pay large license fees in order to engage in the business, and in addition to these fees a tax of 2 cents per pound is imposed upon all oleomargarine.

Under this law the manufacturer must keep such books and inventories and give such notices and bonds as may be required of him by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

His oleomargarine must be sold in a certain prescribed way, with certain prescribed marks and brands and stamps affixed upon it.

In the language of the law itself, the business of a manufacturer of oleomargarine is always under the surveillance and supervision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his agents and deputies.

The retail dealer can only sell from the original package, nor can the original package in which the oleomargarine comes, or the stamps, be used a second time.

A violation of any of these provisions of the law brings upon the violator the penalty of the law.

Any oleomargarine deleterious to health that is put upon the market, and any unstamped packages of oleomargarine, become immediately forfeited to the Government, and in addition proper penalties are imposed.

One analytical chemist and one microscopist, at a salary of $2,500 each per annum, are authorized to be employed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in order to carry out the provisions of the present law, and, in addition, he is authorized to employ such additional chemists and microscopists as are found to be necessary.

As to the wisdom or unwisdom of this law as it now exists, we are not to-day concerned. We are dealing with it as an existing fact. Our investigation shows, however, that it is apparently ample, sweeping, and drastic enough to protect the public from the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine and to compel oleomargarine to be sold for what it is.

We find further, from the report of the minority of the committee, that many of the leading chemists and scientists of this and other countries have testified that oleomargarine is an absolutely pure, wholesome, and cleanly food product, and in no way is harmful or deleterious to health. The majority of the committee make no issue upon this point, and we may, therefore, assume that the purpose of this bill is in no way to protect the consumer from an impure or unhealthful food product. In fact, the discussion that has been had upon this floor has demonstrated that there is perhaps no food product to-day that is more closely watched than oleomargarine, and perhaps none that the public is better protected against impurities in.

What, then, is the evil that this bill proposes to remedy, and what is the remedy proposed? The evil is charged to be that oleomargarine is colored to imitate butter, and, being so colored, is sold as butter, and not as oleomargarine, to an unsuspecting public. Briefly, the charge is that the present law, designed to compel oleomargarine to be sold as oleomargarine, is being violated, and this alleged violation is the real evil that this bill is proposed to remedy.

The first remedy proposed in the bill is to say by act of Congress that oleomargarine shipped from one State to another, under the protection of the interstate-commerce law, shall, upon reaching the State of its delivery, regardless of the interstate-commerce law, become at once subject to the laws of that State with reference to the sale of oleomargarine.

I have not the time to discuss the legal, and perhaps the constitutional, questions involved in this kind of legislation, nor have I any objection to urge against the law of the State of Georgia upon the subject of oleomargarine becoming immediately applicable to all oleomargarine the moment it reaches the State of Georgia. Indeed, I believe that our law so applies now, and would not become any more applicable by reason of the passage of this bill. That this is true is perhaps due to the nature of the law that we have in Georgia. I want to say, however, upon this particular provision of the pending bill that, speaking for myself, I believe that each State is a sovereign, and in its own sphere that its power is complete. I do not believe that the Congress has any power to subtract from the constitutional power of any State, nor do I believe that Congress can add to that power. In other words, I believe that when Congress undertakes to delegate powers to a State the same principle is involved as when Congress undertakes to subtract from the powers of a State. I do not favor that kind of legislation.

This provision in the bill, I presume, was inserted by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Schollenberg case, wherein it was held that the prohibitory law against oleomargarine in the State of Pennsylvania did not apply to oleomargarine shipped into the State while under the protection of the interstate-commerce law.

I think it better to let this question rest where the Supreme Court left it, and let Congress deal directly with all matters in which interstate commerce is involved, and not attempt to delegate its powers to the States, or in any manner seek to avoid its own proper exercise of them.

The next provision of importance in the pending bill, and the one to which the most serious objection is to be urged, is the one providing that when oleomargarine is "made in imitation of butter" the tax shall be 10 cents per pound, instead of 2 cents, as under the existing law.

I invite the attention of the House particularly to the language of this provision, to wit, "made in imitation of butter." The original bill, as it was introduced, contained the word "yellow," and the language of this provision then read, "made in imitation of yellow butter." The committee, however, in its wisdom, saw proper to strike the word "yellow," and to leave this provision so as to impose a tax of 10 cents per pound on all oleomargarine made in imitation of butter, regardless of its color. The question of color is not involved in the pending bill as it now stands.

Everyone knows that oleomargarine is intended as a substitute for butter, and that it is made in imitation of butter. It seems to me that when it has the general form or appearance of butter, or appears to be of the same general consistency, or has the odor or the taste of butter, that it is undoubtedly made in imitation of butter. It would therefore follow that if this bill becomes a law not yellow oleomargarine alone, but all oleomargarine, whether it be red, or blue, or yellow, will become subject to a tax of 10 cents per pound. The friends of this measure have all along insisted that by this bill they were reducing the tax on oleomargarine not colored in imitation of butter from 2 cents to one-quarter of a cent per pound, and that they had no objection to uncolored oleomargarine being sold; but we find that they have presented a bill that, either intentionally or through an oversight of the committee, as I hope, will not allow any oleomargarine, no matter what its color, to be sold.

Some of the friends of this increased tax have undertaken to defend it upon this floor upon the ground that the same principle is involved in a 10-cent tax as in the 2-cent tax already imposed, and that there is no difference in principle between this bill and the original law of 1886. For my part I am able to see, or at least I think I am, a vast difference in principle between the two taxes. It seems to me that there is a great gulf between a simple revenue tax, easily paid without hurt to the business paying it, and one that it is impossible to pay and which is prohibitory in its effect. It may, for instance, be perfectly proper to levy a revenue tax on tobacco, one that is sufficiently low to allow the tobacco industry to thrive and flourish, and yet it would be highly improper and wrong to make this tax so exorbitant that the tobacco interest could not pay it and live.

I recognize that this country—unwisely, however, as I believe—has for a great many years pursued the policy of levying prohibitory taxes through the medium of the tariff laws, but these taxes, it has always been claimed, have been directed against the foreigner. Under the principle of high protection we have made our tariff laws high enough to be repressive in many instances, but in every instance the claim has been made that the repression was directed against the foreigner. We have in the pending bill, however, the direct attempt to apply this principle of high protection and repressive taxation against a part of our own people in favor of another part. It does seem to me that if the phrase "protection run mad" can ever be applied to any proposition it must be applied to this one.

If we now enter upon the policy marked out in this bill, where will it end? We can multiply instances where it can be invoked with as much consistency and as much justice as it is invoked here. For instance, the people of my section are engaged in the making of a pure cane sirup, which they believe to be as pure and as wholesome as can be found in the world. They have not yet reached the limit to which they will engage in it. In truth, the industry is yet in its infancy. Suppose, however, as this industry grows it invades the the territory of the maple-sirup people, could not the friends of maple sirup, invoking the principle of this bill, ask for repressive taxation to keep cane sirup from competing with them?

Again, another suggestion on a little different line occurs to me. The country to-day is full of an adulterated, chemically concocted maple sirup. It is branded and sold as pure maple sirup. It is an imposition upon the public. Would not the sanity of any man be questioned who undertook to repress this evil by taxing the genuine maple sirup out of existence? And yet that is identically the proposition involved in the pending bill.

Pursuing, however, the subject of high protection, if this Congress undertakes to apply this principle among our own people, where purely domestic interests are involved, the outcome of it is cause for serious apprehension. Such an application must array section against section, interest against interest, greed against greed, and it must ever be the battle of the strong against the weak, and the final and utter perversion of the great principles of equity and justice upon which this Government was founded.

Let us proceed further and see the first and immediate effect of the increased tax rate from 2 cents to 10 cents per pound. The report of the majority of the committee informs us that the average cost to the manufacturer of oleomargarine of a pound of his finished product is, including the present tax, 10.59 cents, and that the same is sold at prices ranging from 11½ cents to 18 cents per pound, or an average of about 14 cents per pound.

With the passage of this bill the cost to the manufacturer, according to these figures, would be 18.59 cents per pound, or more than the highest price at which the product is now sold. The passage of the bill will mean one of two things; either the consumer must pay this additional price for the product or else the manufacturer of it must go out of business. There is no justification, in my opinion, for either of these alternatives to be brought about. It must be patent to anyone that if the present law, which absolutely prohibits oleomargarine from being sold as anything else, is defective, the defect, whatever it is, can not be cured and is not even attempted to be cured by this bill. The manufacturer of oleomargarine can not now, with or without coloring his product, sell it for butter without incurring the serious penalty of the law; and this bill does not provide any greater penalty for violating the law than now exists, nor does it make it any harder or more difficult to perpetrate a fraud than does the present law. If the pending bill will have any effect whatever upon the fraud, it seems to me that its tendency must be to increase the fraud, as it offers a greater incentive to commit fraud, to wit, the saving of 10 cents per pound tax as against 2 cents at present.

If the manufacturer of oleomargarine complies with the present law and sells his product as oleomargarine, he should be privileged to sell it in whatever color he chooses to make it. The manufacturer of butter is privileged to color his product, and he does color it in such way as he thinks will add to its attractiveness and its sale, and the same privilege should be given to the manufacturer of oleomargarine when he sells his product for what it is. If the coloring of oleomargarine made it deleterious to health, or even tended to make it so, then the coloring should be prohibited and not taxed or licensed, as this bill proposes to do. No claim is made, however, that this coloring affects oleomargarine injuriously any more than it is claimed that coloring butter affects it injuriously. The majority of the committee inform us not that the coloring is hurtful, but that investigations have shown that "uncolored oleomargarine can be easily and quickly colored without melting or apparent injury to the product."

It is true the charge is freely made that it is a fraud for the manufacturer of oleomargarine to color his product yellow, and yet the friends of this measure do not condemn the maker of butter for coloring his product yellow. If the one is per se a fraud the other is equally so, for the coloring is exactly the same in each case. If it should be declared a crime for the manufacturer of oleomargarine to color his product, it should equally be declared a crime for the maker of butter to color his product. There is no justification in principle for making any distinction between them in this regard.

No charge is made, so far as I know, that the manufacturers of oleomargarine do not comply with the law. The minority of the committee inform us that no charge of this kind is made, or if made could be sustained, and yet it appears that because unscrupulous retail dealers in oleomargarine, who buy the product as oleomargarine from the manufacturers and sell it as butter in violation of the law, it is proposed by this bill to increase the burdens of the manufacturer, if not to drive him out of business. No more unjust, unfair, or inequitable legislation could be proposed. What could be more unjust than to punish one man for the sins of another?

The most interesting part of this whole question is that nobody seems to be clamoring for this bill except the manufacturers of butter. In all the petitions and memorials and letters that have come to this Congress on this subject I have seen none except those from the butter men. No consumer or body of consumers has been heard from so far as my information goes. There is no clamor or appeal for the protection of the consumer, but the entire bill is for the protection of the butter makers.

I am willing, Mr. Chairman, to give the butter makers all the protection to their business that is needful and in consonance with sound principles and good morals, but I am opposed to using the taxing power of this Government for the purpose of crushing out a legitimate industry for the benefit of a competing industry. In my judgment the man with the beef steer has as many rights in this body as the man with the milk cow. The man with cotton seed, with hogs, and with beef cattle, the products of which go into the making of oleomargarine, are each entitled to as much standing here as the man with milk cows. We have no right on principle to curtail the market of these people for their products in order that the market for the man with milk cows may be enlarged. To do so would be to engage in vicious class legislation, productive of more evils than I can point out in the brief time I have to speak.

The charge has been freely made on this floor that the pressure for the enactment of this bill into a law comes from the promoters of an immense butter trust that is now being organized. Whether or not this be true, I am not prepared to say; but I am clearly of the opinion that the small producer of butter—the man who supplies only the home market—has no interest whatever in this proposed legislation, for, whether it be enacted into law or not, the price of his product will not be affected. He can always command a market for what he produces, and oleomargarine has never yet competed with him, and never will.

The majority of the committee do not make themselves plain in their report when they express the opinion that, after the passage of this bill, the sale of oleomargarine will continue. Do they mean continue to the same extent as now, or to a greater or a lesser extent? Since I have heard at least one supporter of this measure declare upon the floor that its passage will increase the sale of oleomargarine and another one declare that its passage will decrease the sale of this product, I am convinced that the language used in the report is a compromise between these two extreme positions.

It is pertinent to inquire, however, if this bill will not curtail the output of oleomargarine, why pass it at all? It is confessedly not a revenue measure, and is not designed as such. It neither adds to nor takes from the stringency of the present law against fraud; then what purpose can it possibly accomplish if it does not restrict the sale of oleomargarine? When the majority of the committee came to write their report, had they forgotten what one of the leading advocates of this measure, ex-Governor Hoard, who visited Georgia and other portions of the South in the interest of this legislation, said before them? They quote him as saying that if as much oleomargarine is sold after the passage of this bill as before, he will come before Congress again and demand a still higher tax. I find, too, that the distinguished gentleman for whom this bill was named in the last Congress, to wit, the honorable Mr. Grout, said to the present committee, in substance, that he feared it was a mistake to reduce, as this bill proposes to do, the tax on oleomargarine not made in imitation of butter from 2 cents to one-fourth cent per pound. His fear was based, as he said, upon the apprehension that the new law would not yield sufficient revenue to defray the expenses of administering it. Surely, if he had any idea that the sale of oleomargarine would continue to the extent that now exists, or that its sale would increase, he would not have given expression to any such fear.

Mr. Chairman, there can be but little merit in the plea of the butter interests for protection against oleomargarine when the statistics show that the total manufacture of oleomargarine in the United States last year was only 104,000,000 pounds, as against 1,500,000,000 pounds of butter. To ask protection, and such protection as this, against this kind of competition, it seems to me, displays a grasping greed that nobody ought to countenance. But even if the claim of the butter people had more merit than it possesses, the kind of protection they ask for should not be granted; for no legitimate industry should be stricken down, or even crippled, by the Government in order to benefit another.

I have no objection to section 4 of this bill, in which it is provided that wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall keep books, subject to the inspection of the internal-revenue officers. I think that provision in line with the present law, and so long as we keep the present law on our statute books I am willing for it to be strengthened in whatever way may be necessary in order to make it effective.

I am in favor of any amendment to it that is in the interest of honesty and fair dealing and against fraud. If it is now defective, let us perfect it, so that it may accomplish the purpose for which it was intended. The minority of the committee have offered a substitute for the pending bill, wherein they increase the penalties for a violation of the present law and provide still further safeguards against the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine. If we are going to enact any further legislation upon this subject, let us enact this substitute into law, for it is aimed solely against fraud, while protecting that which is honest and legitimate, and in both these respects it differs from the pending bill.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the wrongful use of the taxing power. I am opposed to using the powers of this Government to build up any industry upon the ruins of another legitimate one. I am opposed to using this Government to aid any monopoly, whether it be in butter or anything else. I am in favor of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." For these reasons this bill can not command my support. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BROWNLOW having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate numbered 78 to the bill (H. R. 9315) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

OLEOMARGARINE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, it does indeed look like thrashing over old straw at this late hour to discuss the questions arising in this debate after the exhaustive debate of a year ago and after all that we have heard on this floor within the past three or four days. But, Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to bring up in a few words the rear of the column in this well-fought battle for the cow. It is a most natural rôle I assume, for really I was a buttermilk ranger, and I am grateful to the cow. [Laughter.]

There are men on both sides of this Chamber who understand what it is to bring up the rear. In defeat, to protect the retreating army; in success, to gather up every halting soldier and urge him to the pursuit, and to see that every prisoner is safe and protected. The men on that side who served with one of the finest bodies of mounted men who ever rode to battle, and those on this side who followed the plume of that prince of cavaliers, J. E. B. Stuart; or rode with brave Morgan, or that greatest general, perhaps, that the cavalry arm of the service produced, the almost invincible wizard of the West, the gallant Forrest—understand and appreciate this simile.

I think I am bringing up the rear of the victors to-day, and while congratulating the successful, I desire to deal gently and kindly with the vanquished. I have dismounted often and walked that some weary prisoner might rest as he rode my horse. And I shall carry the burden to-day that some of my colleagues on this side may, I trust, feel better satisfied. May I not yield one hope, that a few, otherwise disposed, now will determine to stand by the cow when I have presented as plainly as I can, as facetiously as I may, as pleasantly as I will, the reasons that impel the majority of the Agricultural Committee to present this bill to the House.

What are the facts in the case, as a lawyer would say, if he were arguing it? Why, Mr. Chairman, 32 States in this Union have passed laws forbidding the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine colored to resemble butter. These States contain a population of over 60,000,000. Their laws on this subject have been upheld by the Supreme Court in three decisions. The law of 1886 that places the tax of 2 cents a pound on oleomargarine in order to enforce the clause requiring the branding of every package sold has been violated. The revenue has been collected, it is true, but the law has not been enforced, except in rare cases, against the offenders.

The present bill, Mr. Chairman, imposes a tax of 10 cents on this article whenever it is colored in imitation of butter; and the result will be that it will take out the large profits realized by the retail dealers and tend to even up the profits on butter and colored oleomargarine.

Now, in this view I am sustained by the judgment of the Hon. W. D. Hoard, president of the National Dairy Union. See my question and his answer on page 34 of the hearings. We have the evidence of the manufacturers themselves to show that the cost of their article, with a tax of 2 cents included, is only about 8 cents per pound.

These two articles of even value, as some claim, would have the same chance in open market, while the uncolored oleomargarine could be sold for 10 or 12 cents, with a good profit to the manufacturer. If this article is as good as butter, as many claim, and it can be sold with a profit at 12 and 13 cents a pound, then it is only a question of a few years perhaps when butter will be driven out of the market and the great dairy interests of the country go to the wall, as some have already gone in the State of Virginia.

It is, then, a discrimination in favor of the manufacturer that we protest against; and we can say that with a tax of 10 cents, if he chooses to pay it, he will stand on all fours with the butter maker. At the same time, the consumers of butter will pay no more than they now pay for this article, save as they are affected by the great law of supply and demand.

You ask me, very naturally, how this is possible. The answer I can give you in a very few words. The profits of this business now go the retail dealer. That is the point in this case, and that is a point which gentlemen should fully understand, for we have abundant evidence to establish it. If you have studied these hearings, my colleagues, you know that this is a fact.

Mr. Chairman, in the old town of Petersburg, Va., around whose outer walls died so many brave men of the two armies, whose deeds of valor will live in song and in story while the lesson of Thermopylæ fires the heart of patriotism and the charge at Balaklava brightens the lamp of chivalry, there is as sweet a little girl as ever "nestled in a woman's arms or climbed a father's knee, the envied kiss to share." She has a peculiar idea about prayer. She thinks she ought to petition the Almighty herself, and, after reciting at her mother's knee every night the Lord's Prayer, she then puts up a petition of her own to her Father in Heaven.

A few years ago, when this little girl was just 4½ years old, her mother asked her, after she had made her silent prayer, "Daughter, what did you ask the Lord to do in that petition just now?" The little girl made reply, "Mamma, I asked the Lord if he would not please remove that mole that has been growing on the side of your face for several months; but I said to Him, Lord, I think that mole has come to stay."

I have not a doubt that this typifies the feeling of some men on this side who are voting along this line—there are just as many all over the country—who are praying that these manufacturers may be entirely suppressed, but they believe, like the little girl in regard to the mole, that these manufacturers have "come to stay." The other side dwelt upon the statement made by Governor Hoard and Mr. Knight in the hearings passed here. These gentlemen may have hoped and prayed one way last year, but under the better light of experience and the education of the last few days, perhaps, and fuller investigation, they believe now that oleomargarine manufacturers have "come to stay."

Mr. Chairman, I know they have come to stay. I was of this opinion last year. When I discussed this question on this floor last session my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES]—and I hope he is in his seat now; we all know that he is possessed of an inquiring mind—asked this question:

Mr. GAINES. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.
Mr. LAMB. Certainly.
Mr. GAINES. Is this 10 per cent tax under the Grout bill a prohibitory tax?
Mr. LAMB. It will very likely have that effect, so far as the colored article is concerned, but it will not prohibit the manufacture of this article in its natural state. I have no question that more of it will be manufactured after the tax is imposed. A taste will be educated for this article and people will buy it, not under the guise of something else, but buy it for what it is, at what it is worth. If they want to color it they have a right to do so in their own homes.

Mr. Chairman, a year ago, before we went out to that historic spot near Washington and witnessed the interesting performance of which I have spoken, I made that declaration, because I was raised on a farm and I knew what could be done in coloring butter. The extract of carrot root will do the same.

If I needed further proof of the fact, it was shown a few weeks ago, when many members of the Committee on Agriculture went by invitation to visit a manufacturing establishment near this city, where, in the years gone by, gentlemen of Congress and their friends were wont to go occasionally to settle their real or fancied difficulties by shooting themselves to death.

The investigation of the manufactory located at the historical spot I have mentioned showed it to be in superb order well and conducted. We saw a pound of oleomargarine in its natural state made into the semblance of butter in a few seconds by working a few drops of coloring matter into the article. We also saw a rolling cylinder filled with the article and the coloring matter uniformly distributed through it as the cylinder was turned by a crank.

In a very short time the white oleo had changed to a beautiful yellow color. The imitation was complete. From the moment that I saw this I was convinced that oleomargarine had come to stay. And, Mr. Chairman, it just shows one thing that is patent in the history of nations and of individuals, that their destinies turn frequently upon points that are in themselves as insignificant as anything you might mention.

A most original and graphic writer, delineating the battle of Waterloo, remarked that here a general of division fell, that there brigades with their commanders perished, that yonder the grand old Imperial Guard, that had never known defeat, plunged the front ranks of its corps into a yawning chasm of earth that the rear might ride across their dead bodies into no less certain death upon the fixed bayonets of the hollow squares of Wellington.

And that writer goes on to show that the grandest army the sun ever shone down on, commanded by the loftiest military genius the world had ever given birth to, was routed and destroyed, for why? Because on one bright Sabbath morning a little cowboy said to a general, "Sire, take this road, not that," referring to the fact, as you well know, that Blücher marched by a more direct route to the scene of action and arrived there just in time to decide the momentous issues of that day. And if I had the time I would show you that a similar occurrence happened right over at the first battle of Manassas, when Kirby Smith was piloted through the woods by a more direct route and arrived in time to decide the issue of that conflict.

Now, my friends, this little incident—this committee visiting that place—discovered what will be told all over the country, to every laboring man's wife in the confines of this Republic, and it will enter into practice, and it will possibly save these oleomargarine people who are pressed to death by a butter trust. Who ever heard of a butter trust, and who believes there could be one? That incident developed two facts; first, that the housekeepers of this country will soon learn how easy it is to color oleomargarine, and when this has once begun, the taste for the food having already been cultivated, the demand for uncolored oleomargarine will begin and the manufacture of the article will be stimulated.

In the second place it showed how easily the provisions of the bill of the minority of the committee could be set aside or evaded. There is nothing in this bill to prevent the purchase by hotel keepers, restaurant and boarding-house people of all the one or two pound packages they choose from a retail dealer and removing the stamp and serving the article to the consumer. I want those who favor this minority report to think about this question along that line.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word to those gentlemen who honestly and conscientiously oppose this bill; and I am going to give them credit for just as much integrity of purpose and as much honesty as I claim for myself and my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, who see no danger lurking in this bill, as has been predicted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], whose epigrammatic sentences were taken as the text for a splendid speech by my friend from Texas.

A word for these Texas people, and I hope my young friend [Mr. BURLESON] is in his seat. Virginia feels an abiding interest in the Lone Star State. Her sons have migrated to that land of promise, and some of the sons of Texas have come back to Virginia to secure the companions of their bosoms. I remember very well that soon after the war a private of my own company migrated to Texas, and Virginians watched him as he carved his name upon the roll of fame high among the civic heroes of this age.

Why, were I a few years younger, from all I hear of that land of promise, I should be tempted to cast my lot with such a people. I might even do so now, save that I have some pride in being buried close by where the beautiful Pocahontas pleaded for the life of the first white man who ascended the historic Chicahominy, a stream that has been made famous both by the early and the latter history of this land. [Laughter.]

But there is another tie between myself and the noble sons of the Lone Star State. I have found my Mentor, my vade mecum. and my spiritual adviser to a great extent in one of her gifted sons. And what shall I do when he is made chief magistrate of that grand Commonwealth? Why, you will have a lamb in the Fifth-eighth Congress without a shepherd. [Laughter.]

I turn, Mr. Chairman, from the contemplation of this delightful picture to one that fills my very soul with regret and mortification. The riot act was read to some of us on this side a few days ago. I fear we will soon have a political reformatory for the Democratic reconcentrados on this side and a commission to pass judgment on their conduct, so that they can be properly dealt with and made to respect the Constitution. Some of us are "timid and misguided Democrats." Some of these men, so defined, have stood where death held high carnival and faced the cannon's mouth or a battle line of flaming muskets as calmly as if on dress parade.

But does my valiant young colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], who used the language above quoted and other adjectives equally as severe, say he was speaking of moral courage? Of course he was. Then let me remind him that—

> The brave man is not he who feels no fear,
> For that were stupid and irrational,
> But he whose noble soul its fears subdues
> And bravely dares the danger nature shrinks from.

Many of these Democrats who will to-morrow record their votes for the pending measure have shown their moral courage, not only in this House, but on many hard-fought political fields in their own States. Some of them resisted carpetbag rule and had the moral courage to refrain from killing the last one who set his foot on Southern soil. They stood manfully defending their few remaining rights when reconstruction laws, unnecessary and tyrannical, were forced upon them. Later on they protested, in sullen silence and gloom at first, and then arose in the majesty of a righteous indignation and rended the shackles that had been forged by the passage of the fifteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LAMB. If I had time I should like to do so, but I have not the time.

Mr. BURLESON. I want to suggest that it was ballots and not bullets that I was referring to.

Mr. LAMB. While many of these things were being accomplished the young gentlemen who pronounced these Democrats timid and misguided were playing leapfrog on the green lawns of their native States. [Laughter.]

No wonder the other side, through one of their talented leaders, made jest of the incident that occurred here yesterday. I will illustrate, simply to point a moral, the emotions they felt by telling a little story that has never drifted from eastern Virginia, or else my colleague from the Sixth district [Mr. OTEY] would have told it here long ago. [Laughter.]

An old widower in one of the lower counties of Virginia was paying his attentions to a beautiful lady in the neighborhood. Although often invited to remain all night by the father of the young lady, he would never consent to do so. One stormy night, however, his host told him that no man could leave his house on such a night as that, and he had his horse put up and persuaded the gentleman to spend the night.

At bedtime he gave a negro boy a candle and told him to see the gentleman to bed. "Yes, sir," said the boy. And the happy old widower followed the boy to his room. He found it difficult to get rid of the boy. He said to him, "I will blow out this candle; you can go." The boy answered, "No, sir; massa said I must see you in bed, an' I'm gw'ine to do it." And the old fellow had to disrobe himself. When he unstrapped an artificial leg and laid it on the table the boy moved back to the door. As he ran his hand through his hair and laid his wig on the mantelpiece the boy had his hand on the knob of the door.

As the widower put his hand in his mouth and laid his gold plate in front of him, the boy rolled down the steps, crying, "Massa, massa, for God's sake come here. This man is tearin' heself all to pieces." [Great laughter.] My friends, "a house divided against itself can not stand." "Men do not gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles."

But we are told that there is another interest that will suffer if this bill passes. The manufacturers of cotton-seed oil are much disturbed, although only 7 per cent of their product is used. There is a growing demand all over the world for this oil. From the frozen shores of the Baltic to the isles of Greece, "where burning Sapho loved and sung," if you will allow a little rhetoric, all Europe is asking for cotton-seed oil.

I see from a book here, that I wish I had time to quote from, that France and Italy both have prohibited oleomargarine from being colored in imitation of butter. France takes $16,000,000 worth of your cotton-seed oil every year, and they send it back to this country made into olive oil to go on the tables of our rich people.

Mr. KLEBERG. Is not that a fraud, and ought it not to be suppressed by legislation?

Mr. LAMB. That is a matter that we have nothing to do with.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If it will not embarrass you, I will ask a question.

Mr. LAMB. You can not embarrass an old soldier and a red-headed man [laughter] by asking questions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I will ask you the question.

Mr. LAMB. Ask it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, if the oleomargarine manufacturer does not manufacture his oleomargarine "in imitation of butter," the 10-cent tax will not apply?

Mr. LAMB. Why, certainly not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then if he does make it "in imitation of butter" he runs up against the law and has to pay the penalty of 10 cents for the violation of the law done by his own voluntary act.

Mr. LAMB. That is the way I understand it. I stated this a year ago when you asked a question that helped me very much.

Now I will come to some more important points; but before I leave this question of cotton-seed oil I wish to say that I was sorry to hear some gentlemen from the splendid Commonwealths of the South dwell upon their losses, and one of them, running his hand gracefully in his pocket, say, "Will you permit these people to rob us of our cotton-seed oil and our cattle interest?"

My friends, the cattle interest is only, as I can figure it, 50 cents or 75 cents a head, and, in view of this legislation, you will net more on the oil than you ever did before, and there will be a better demand for home consumption of cotton-seed oil that comes from the Southern States. It is $500,000 divided up among the ten Southern States.

Mr. BELLAMY. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. LAMB. I have not the time.

Mr. BELLAMY. The gentlemen says $500,000. Was it not over two and one-half millions last year?

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman is good at figures. Take the 104,000,000 pounds of oleo manufactured. The report of the Treasurer of the United States gives you the component parts. Take your 7 per cent of cotton-seed oil and satisfy yourself.

Now, as to the constitutionality of this law. On this floor, at the last session, I quoted various decisions of the Supreme Court and several writers on the Constitution that clearly established the right of this body to enact such a law as this. These decisions have already been referred to during the able discussion on this measure and I will not repeat them. My colleague from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] brushed aside in a few words the basic principle upon which the opponents of this measure rest their whole case. He said:

> I deny the right of Congress to make any such legislation. I am not going to deny it on constitutional grounds. I understand too well that in these later days the Constitution is an old-fashioned instrument that has no place in our discussion on this floor, and I understand too well that in these times of a "shifting majority of one" he would be a bold man indeed who would attempt to prophesy what would be the fate of any legislation when it reached the court of last resort.

It is not enough for the opponents of this measure, driven under the three recent decisions of the Supreme Court as well as the forceful utterances of the same tribunal years long gone by to abandon this contention, that this measure is unconstitutional, but in the heat of debate here they inveigh against a coordinate branch of this Government. This may be permissible on the hustings. Even then I submit that it is in poor taste, for the reason that anything tending to break down respect for law and authority is to be deplored in a government constituted as this Republic.

If there is one sin in America more marked than another, it is a lack of reverence—reverence for authority; reverence for law; reverence for age; reverence for the Sabbath. In some sections, even reverence for women.

Mr. COWHERD. And lack of reverence for the cow. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAMB. Nay, sir; rather reverence for "the maiden all forlorn, that milked the cow with the crumpled horn."

In this particular, Mr. Chairman, I hold that we are in danger of losing our ideals just as the Roman ideal of obedience to law and authority was lost when Roman probity and virtue declined and the noble Roman youth became corrupted by contact with the vices of the Asiatic nations whom they conquered.

But permit me to notice one practical point presented by my eloquent friend from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD]. He made a fine speech, we all admit.

It is a well-known fact that the oleomargarine makers use only about $4,000,000 beef fat, $2,000,000 lard, and $2,000,000 per year of animal fats in the oleomargarine that is produced in this country. Our friend from Kansas City states that he has it from one of the best-informed cattlemen in the United States if they are deprived of a market for that amount of animal fat it will cause a loss to the live-stock industry of this country of something like $62,000,000 per year. I presume that this is about as well founded as most of the claims made by the live-stock men.

But, accepting the statement as true, let us look at the matter in another light. The manufacture and sale of oleomargarine is displacing $25,000,000 worth of butter annually. If the cutting off of a market for $4,000,000 of product will cause the live-stock men a loss of $62,000,000, which in round numbers is $16 for every dollar's worth of product displaced, why will not the displacing of $25,000,000 worth of butter cost the dairyman sixteen times that amount, or $400,000,000 annually? Isn't one proposition as reasonable as the other?

What's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Now, about the $500,000 cotton-seed oil that goes into the manufacture of oleomargarine. Why, it is only a bagatelle to the Commonwealths of the South, with all their wealth. Even could the opponents of this bill show that this tax would be prohibitory, you can not check the march of progress in the South. Young men from Texas, you have behind you the most splendid inspiration that ever nerved a people to the race of life since the dawn of civilization on the world. [Applause.]

What does the spirit of Alamo teach you? Where is the example of your noble fathers who charged like demigods at Gaines Mills and in the dense woods of Chancellorsville who made a record for themselves and for the South that will live in song and in story while the sky has a star or the ocean a tide. And now these, their descendants, are asking us to protect the interests of cotton-seed oil!

Mr. BURLESON. If the gentleman will pardon me, we are not asking protection, but we are protesting against protection.

Mr. LAMB. Exactly. I only wish I had fifteen minutes to make that utterance the text for a speech on this subject. Now, I want as succinctly as I can to illustrate the position of my colleagues on this side, and I must do it by telling another little anecdote.

There was down in Virginia, along the seacoast, a fishing party shipwrecked on one occasion from a small boat. Standing along the banks was an anxious and solicitous crowd. One man was particularly interested in a friend that had gone down twice, and he cried out in the agony of his soul, "Save, oh, for God's sake, save that redheaded man you see there who has gone down twice." As he was sinking a third time under the briny waves a man seized him by the hair and pulled him ashore.

The man that saved him was curious to know why this man wanted him saved. He said, "He is your brother, ain't he?" "No, sir." "Then he is your first cousin?" "No, sir; he isn't any kin to me." "Then," says the man who saved him, "in the name of common sense, why did you want him saved above all the others?" "Why," he said, "my friend, to tell you the truth, that fellow owes me $2.50. [Laughter].

Mr. TALBERT. He was a dairyman, was he not?

Mr. LAMB. No, sir; he had that $2.50 invested in cotton-seed oil.

We object to the minority plan for several reasons. I will give you one or two.

First, the minority plan attempts to legalize the coloring of oleomargarine, against which 32 States of this Union have protested.

In the second place, the provisions of that minority bill will certainly cripple, and it may be will finally destroy, the great butter interests of this country.

Third. The temptation to fraud, which is the basic principle of this whole question, will only be removed in the degree that the price of this article is lowered by the absence of competition, for the hotel, restaurant, or boarding-house keeper, as well as all men who purchase this article to sell again, can buy as much as they choose in 1 or 2 pound packages and then put it on their table or sell it to their customers. The present law, bad as it is, would be preferable to this proposition of the minority.

The advocates of this substitute ask why should it not be just as permissible to color oleomargarine as to color butter. We reply, because they are not colored for the same purpose at all. Butter is not colored to resemble a better article; oleomargarine is colored to make it resemble a better product—colored to deceive. That is what it is done for. The coloring adds nothing to the food value of the article. The proposed taxation against colored oleomargarine works no hurt to the consumer. Those who want that substitute for butter can buy it much cheaper in its natural state.

My time is nearly out, yet I have not touched one of the main questions presented in connection with this bill—what the laboring man has got to say about it. My colleagues, I represent a district where there are two large cities and over 1,000 manufacturers, small and great. There are 10,000 workingmen in those two cities, and not a single man of them has written me upon this question. And their commissioner of labor, who has their confidence and support, has written me that he is in favor of the bill.

The merchants in the city of Richmond who deal in this article all write me that they are in favor of the bill. Gentlemen here have asked me, "How is it that you, representing a commercial as well as an agricultural community, are so strong in favor of this bill?" I answer, because I represent an intelligent people who read, and they know the fraud that is being practiced in the city of Richmond. Many merchants of that city have written me letters indorsing the bill.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman state what merchants?

Mr. LAMB. I will insert some of their letters. I have not time now to go over all the names.

Mr. WACHTER. Are they butter merchants?

Mr. LAMB. Butter merchants—commission merchants.

Mr. WACHTER. I thought so.

Mr. LAMB. Here is a letter that presents the case in such a strong light that it will carry conviction to the mind of my friend from Maryland [Mr. WACHTER]:

Hon. JOHN LAMB, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We write in the interest of the Grout bill, to beg for it your vote and your influence.

Because the manufacture of butterine has almost destroyed the butter interest of the State.

Because it is not right that the few who are making this bogus butter should add to their millions at the expense of every poor woman in the land who owns a cow.

Because the business in oleomargarine or butterine encourages deception, it being regularly advertised and palmed off as genuine butter, and is so advertised now in this city.

I mention but few of the many reasons that call for the passage of this Grout bill, and beg you to support the bill.

Yours, truly, J. D. McINTIRE.

The editor of the Southern Planter, a leading agricultural journal of the South, published in Richmond, Va., writes as follows:

DEAR SIR: I hope that we may count on you using all your influence in favor of the Grout bill now before the Agricultural Committee. The dairying interest in the South, and especially in Virginia, is becoming a large one, and this bill is of great importance to that interest.

Yours, truly, J. F. JACKSON.

A petition from the merchants and citizens of Richmond, Va., numerously signed, asking for the passage of this bill, says in part:

We highly commend your position in this matter and assure you that your attitude can not affect the interest of anybody in this State who is complying with our State laws, while the accomplishment of the object which you seek to attain would put thousands of dollars into the pockets of the people now going into the pockets of bogus butter makers of other States.

We believe the bill a just and honest one, and we further know that public opinion demands it, and, were it put to a vote with our people, that 90 per cent of the people would vote for it. We further assure you that 90 per cent of our people who buy oleomargarine buy and eat it for butter, as we have never seen or heard of oleomargarine being advertised as oleomargarine, but always as pure or fine creamery butter. See the deception used.

These letters and petitions clearly indicate the views of my constituents on this important subject, and I take it that the same opinions are held by a large majority of citizens of the rest of the State.

The commissioner of agriculture of the State of Virginia, in a letter of recent date written to me on the subject, says:

The merchants make such a large profit from the sale of oleomargarine they prefer handling it to butter, and it has consequently ruined the dairy interest in this State. Ten years ago the dairy business in this State was developing splendidly, but now most of them have closed up on account of competition of oleomargarine. Our farmers are heavy losers on this account.

The failure of our farmers to keep a large number of cows and raise more stock is hurtful to the agricultural advancement in this State.

The State board of agriculture at its last meeting, November 30, unanimously passed a resolution requesting the Congressmen and Senators of this State to support the Grout bill.

I produce this witness, and could easily add many others, to offset the declaration made in the very able report of the minority of the committee that "the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine does not interfere with the growth and prosperity of the butter industry."

Virginia is almost a unit for this measure. In evidence of this she will present nearly a solid vote here. There are able lawyers in the Virginia delegation. If they were convinced that danger lurked in this bill, as predicted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], do you suppose they would give it their support? Virginia needs and demands this legislation; her small industries have been wonderfully quickened in the past decade.

The enterprises in her manufacturing centers have contributed in good part. Outside capital has been coming into the State. Northern and Western farmers have been buying lands. The census report shows that the State is being divided into smaller farms, and that the intensive versus the extensive system of agriculture prevails. The commissioner of agriculture, the agricultural board of the State, and the agricultural people all favor this measure. The farmers, as a rule, demand it. No Virginia Representative need fear to cast his vote for the bill.

Its provisions when enacted into law will work in harmony with the laws of 32 States of the Union.

Oleomargarine, colored in imitation of butter, will have a fair chance. The temptation to perpetrate fraud and deceive customers will be abated, if not entirely removed.

It is the duty of every legislative body to pass the necessary laws to prevent fraud and deception. Nothing grows so fast as crime. Countenance the smallest crime, and it will increase tenfold. License one crime, and there are persons always willing to commit a greater crime and point to the crime licensed as their excuse.

Pass this bill and 5,000,000 farmers will approve your action, while their children will rise up and call you blessed. Pass this bill and thousands upon thousands of dealers in butter all through our land will heave a sigh of relief and say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servants."

The patient, toiling tillers of the soil, the bone and sinew of the land, the producers, as well as the consumers, who do not often ask legislation at your hands, now urge you to pass a measure that will help resuscitate our common mother earth.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill will relieve struggling men, helpless women, and defenseless children in nearly every State of this Union. It will help to save the farmer. When you save him you save your country.

Who saves his country saves all things, and all things saved shall bless him; who lets his country die lets all things die, and all things dying shall curse him.

[Applause.]

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Chairman, as a new member of this House I have followed the course of this debate with some degree of amusement and a still greater degree of amazement; and I believe my amazement has reached its climax in listening to the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat—not only amazement, but a certain degree of humiliation. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] has seen proper to apostrophize Texas—"young Texas"—and the representatives of "young Texas." I can only reply by saying that the saddest thing that can befall a man or a people or a State is to find a shattered idol and a deserted shrine. The people of Texas, from the time that she first fought for her independence and established her integrity as a free Commonwealth, have been accustomed to look to the State of Virginia, the "Old Dominion," the birthplace and the last resting place of Thomas Jefferson, as the center of their political hope and the shrine of their political faith. And to find that hope forsaken and that faith betrayed by such degenerate Virginia statesmanship as we have listened to during the last few minutes is enough to shatter the idols and to destroy the hopes of even "young Texas." [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, a careful reading of the testimony adduced before the Committee on Agriculture of the House at the various hearings that have been held upon the bill, and a critical analysis of the arguments that have been made on the floor by the advocates of the measure, seem to me to establish beyond question the pernicious features of the proposed legislation, both as a particular exercise of unwarranted Federal power and as a general declaration of vicious Federal policy. I submit that no fair-minded man who has examined this testimony and listened to these arguments can come to any other conclusion than that this bill is intended to materially damage, if not to utterly destroy, the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, together with every interest and industry concerned in the production of that useful and harmless article of food supply.

Disguise it as they will by specious pretexts, avoid it as they may by ingenious and sophistical reasoning, the men who originated this measure and are pressing its passage have but one object in view; that is, to tear down and drive out oleomargarine production for the purpose of building up and enriching the Dairy Union and the butter trust. It is the rankest attempt at class legislation and governmental discrimination in favor of one private industry and against another that was ever made in Congress or anywhere else in this country. In fact, no one who professes to speak authoritatively for the origin and objects of the bill pretends to deny that this is its purpose. I shall not take time to draw attention to the many admissions to this effect contained in the hearings reported from the committees of this and the last Congress. I will merely quote from the "Views of the minority" of the Committee on Agriculture in support of their substitute bill, as follows:

Mr. Adams, pure food commissioner of the State of Wisconsin, in his testimony before the committee on March 7, 1900, said:

"There is no use beating about the bush in this matter. We want to pass this law and drive the oleomargarine manufacturers out of the business."

Charles Y. Knight, secretary of the National Dairy Union, in a letter to the Virginia Dairyman, dated May 18, 1900, writes:

"Now is the time for you to clip the fangs of the mighty octopus of the oleomargarine manufacturers who are ruining the dairy interests of this country by manufacturing and selling in defiance of law a spurious article in imitation of pure butter. We have a remedy almost in grasp which will eliminate the manufacture of this article from the food-product list. The Grout bill, now pending in the Agricultural Committee of the House of Representatives in Congress, meets the demand."

W. D. Hoard, ex-governor of Wisconsin and president of the National Dairy Union, stated in his testimony before the committee on March 7, 1900, as follows:

"To give added force to the first section of the bill, it is provided in the second section that a tax of 10 cents a pound shall be imposed on all oleomargarine in the color or semblance of butter. In plain words, this is repressive taxation."

And on January 13, 1902, in his testimony before the Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, the same witness, replying to the question as to "whether this bill (H. R 9206—or similar measure) would be demanded if, after its passage, just as much oleomargarine would be manufactured and put on the market as is now manufactured and sold," said:

"In that case, sir, I would come before Congress and demand a still higher tax."

Mr. JOHNSON. What he said was "We will demand a higher tax."

Mr. WOOTEN. And all this is still further established by the fact that the advocates of this measure are not willing to confine themselves within the limits of a just and reasonable protection against fraud. If the object was to detect and prevent the sale of spurious imitations of genuine butter, then the law already on the statute books does that as well as any rational police regulation can do, and if it did not, the substitute bill reported here by the minority of the committee strengthens it to the satisfaction of any man who merely wants protection against fraud. The present law forbids the coloring of oleomargarine to imitate butter, imposes heavy occupation taxes upon the manufacturers and dealers in the article, requires it to be stamped and labeled for what it is, and exacts severe penalties for a violation of these provisions. The substitute bill increases these license taxes, enlarges the penalties, and in every way meets the demands for adequate protection to the purchaser and consumer. But this is not enough, because it is not what is sought by the dairy trust. They must have "repressive taxation," effective discrimination, total destruction of a rival industry.

To show how completely the original contentions upon which the claim for this kind of legislation was based have been abandoned, we have only to review the history of antioleomargarine legislation. There was a time when the enemies of this trade declared that oleomargarine was a most despicable and deleterious article, unfit for food consumption under any and all circumstances. That contention was exploded in France thirty years ago. The first artificial butter was made in that country in 1867, and at once a "cow crusade" began against its manufacture and sale, on the ground of its unwholesomeness. The dairymen were aghast at the prospect of such an inroad upon their monopoly. But the chemists and scientific experts of France declared the denunciation to be unfounded in fact and unsupported by experiment.

Mr. LAMB. Does not the gentleman know that both France and Italy legislated against it?

Mr. WOOTEN. Certainly; because the same dairy trust succeeded in controlling the legislature of France that apparently controls this House to-day. But the scientific experience and the scientific judgment of France did not sustain the contention. And I want to tell the gentleman when he goes to foreign countries and foreign governments that he is simply falling in line with the men who are to-day advocating this kind of legislation. We are not France; neither are we Germany, nor England, nor Italy, nor Austria. We are America, and supposed to be governed by the constitutional rule of uniform and equal taxation.

In 1888 the State board of health of Massachusetts, after an exhaustive investigation, reported that the prejudice against oleomargarine was without foundation in fact or reason; that its wholesomeness as food was unquestionable, and that its manufacture and sale were attended with as much average care, cleanliness, and honesty as genuine butter from the dairies of the country. For ten years past this judgment has been confirmed with increasing emphasis by the observation and experience of the world, and there is not to-day in Europe or America a reliable and competent chemist or food expert who does not cheerfully attest the fact that this despised product is among the most desirable, necessary, healthy, and inexpensive sources of food supply. So the sanitary argument is no longer seriously urged or listened to by candid and intelligent men anywhere.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOTEN. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. Do you not know that the laws against the sale of this patent butter in Massachusetts are more strict than in any other State in this Union to-day?

Mr. WOOTEN. Certainly; but I know that those laws were passed in the face of the opinion of the best experts in your State and because your legislature, like so many others, was subsidized by the same trust that is trying to subsidize this House. [Laughter.] I quote from the scientific reports of the board of health of your State, not from the results of lobbying legislation in the halls of your legislature.

Mr. THAYER. I guess you have never been up there.

Mr. WOOTEN. No, sir; and I do not want to go there. [Laughter.] But I have read the records of your State, and I know the kind of your legislation from the days of King Philip down.

Mr. THAYER. Are there any better laws in any State in the Union than are recorded there in Massachusetts?

Mr. WOOTEN. I think so.

Mr. THAYER. Where? In Texas?

Mr. WOOTEN. I would much prefer the laws of Texas.

Mr. THAYER. That is a matter of taste.

Mr. WOOTEN. Entirely so.

Mr. TAWNEY. Just as it is in reference to oleomargarine.

Mr. WOOTEN. Just as it is with reference to a great many other matters involved in this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say this question of sanitation, the question of the wholesome character of oleomargarine as a food, is not a debatable question. As I have said, there is not to-day in America or Europe a competent or reliable food expert or chemist who will declare that oleomargarine is an unwholesome article of food. No one has done so.

Next came the plea for protection against fraudulent imitations of genuine butter, and the "color test" was urged as the criterion that should be recognized and enforced by law. In all of the first bills proposed upon this subject the gravamen of the offense was made to consist in the coloring of oleomargarine to resemble real butter, and it was sought to prohibit the use of any coloring matter that would imitate the color of genuine dairy butter. But that argument, too, has failed and is no longer insisted upon. In the testimony before the committee the champions of the Dairy Union admitted that it would not sustain their purpose. They testified that genuine butter varies in color at different seasons of the year and according to the different cows used and the variety of povender fed to the herds.

No man can say with any degree of accuracy or certainty what the natural color of butter is or may be under varying conditions. Therefore it would be manifestly absurd and impracticable to prohibit or to punish the imitation of an undefined and indefinable color. Then, again, it is universally admitted that most of the dairy butter in the market is artificially colored, and that the dairymen use precisely the same material for the purpose that is used by the oleomargarine manufacturers, generally what is known in the laboratory as "annotto." Now, the law could scarcely define or impute to any man a fraudulent intent in imitating something that itself has no fixed or natural standard of color and which itself has been artificially and fraudulently colored to resemble some supposed standard of excellence or beauty.

Mr. LAMB. But my friend knows it is not colored to imitate a superior article. Butter is colored to meet the demand for yellow butter.

Mr. WOOTEN. I do not care to yield further to the vagaries of my friend from Virginia.

Mr. LAMB. They are not vagaries.

Mr. WOOTEN. I must decline to yield. Governor Hoard, in his testimony before the committee, stated emphatically, and you will find it reported here, that no genuine butter had any specific or definite color; that it varied at different seasons, and that it varied in the same bulk taken from the same dairy; and he expressly stated that he refused to have the color test applied to butter. He said that there was no means of knowing at a given time what is the only and proper color of butter, and therefore you see how impossible and how impracticable it would be to apply the test of fraud upon the subject of color.

Mr. DAHLE. Did not Governor Hoard expressly state that butter had a yellow tinge, and that it varies in shade?

Mr. WOOTEN. He expressly stated in the first place, when they asked him about it—if he would not be satisfied to leave oleomargarine uncolored—and he said "no."

Mr. DAHLE. That does not answer my question. Did he not claim that all butter is yellow?

Mr. WOOTEN. No, sir.

Mr. DAHLE. But in different shades?

Mr. WOOTEN. He expressly refused to answer that question when proposed to him. Now, I do not care to consume my time by details of the question. You have got the printed hearings before you. What I am undertaking to show, Mr. Chairman, is that this plea of sanitation, this plea of fraudulent imitation, is a mere subterfuge, a means by which they seek to tear down and destroy and drive out of the market the oleomargarine industry. That is the fixed object.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does not the gentleman think that fraud has been perpetrated?

Mr. WOOTEN. No, sir; to take what some of these men say you might believe so.

Mr. HAUGEN. It has been admitted by everybody.

Mr. WOOTEN. I have never admitted it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Eighty per cent of it——

Mr. WOOTEN. No man ever admitted it; but these men assume it, and base their whole fight upon an assumption, not upon established facts.

Mr. HAUGEN. Everybody knows that 80 per cent of that which is sold is a fraud.

Mr. WOOTEN. Who knows it?

Mr. HAUGEN. Secretary Gage stated that in his report last year.

Mr. WOOTEN. That has never been disclosed to this House, and, besides, is not very good authority.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think you have disclosed the fact that you do not know very much about what you are talking about.

Mr. WOOTEN. Perhaps not, but I have read the hearings before the committee, and that is the only means of obtaining authentic information that we have. I do not pretend to know all that some of these gentlemen know in this House, but I say there is no authentic statement of any man here that there is any more fraud in the treatment and sale of oleomargarine than there is in the sale or manufacture of butter or any other commodity that is put upon the market. It would be impossible under the laws to absolutely prevent fraud in any line. There is not a pursuit or line of manufacture in this country in which there is not some fraud committed. If there is, I would like to know what it is.

There is no more fraud committed in the manufacture of oleomargarine than there is in dairy butter. Why, I have here a copy of the Chicago Dairy Produce, which is the official organ of the National Dairy Union, and in that paper I find a page devoted to an advertisement of a certain preparation of boracic acid, called "Preservitas," which is recommended to the butter manufacturers, the butter producers, as a means of preserving butter. Well, we all know the history of boracic acid during the Spanish war. We know how many poor soldiers went to their death with the preserved beef doctored with a preparation of this same "Preservitas," which this journal says is prepared to be used by the butter makers. I tell you, there is as much fraud, especially in the coloring and preservation of butter, as there is in the oleomargarine business.

Mr. DAHLE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him this question: Are you prepared to say that there is at any time any ingredient put in butter to make it keep except salt?

Mr. WOOTEN. I speak by authority of the organ of the dairy trust.

Mr. DAHLE. If the gentleman says that is the organ of the dairy trust, have you any means by which you can prove that?

Mr. WOOTEN. It says so.

Mr. DAHLE. Is there any such thing as a dairy trust? Do you know of such a trust?

Mr. WOOTEN. Well, I do not know that anybody knows absolutely about any of these great combinations called trusts. That is the idea I have about it, and, I think, so would any other man who was capable of intelligent appreciation. There is no doubt that this whole movement was conceived and originated by the National Dairy Union. You can call it a trust if you please. Perhaps it is not, technically and legally speaking, a trust. Some gentleman called attention the other day to the great butter trust that was organized in Kansas City lately, with $18,000,000 capital.

Mr. POU. Do you doubt that the oleomargarine is a trust also?

Mr. WOOTEN. I do not know; and I do not care; but if it is, I do not think this Congress ought to discriminate between one trust and another by encouraging the one with a protective tariff and imposing upon the other a proscriptive burden that will drive it out. If they are both trusts, then they both ought to be suppressed; but not under a tariff protection so that one may destroy the other. I do not believe in that. The taxing power of the Federal Government was never conferred by the Constitution for that purpose.

Mr. DAHLE. Will you allow another question? In speaking of trusts. In the State of Wisconsin——

Mr. WOOTEN. I do not want to have any controversy with you about the State of Wisconsin. I do not care to go into these details, and I decline to yield further.

What we are now asked to do is to impose a confiscatory tax upon the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, regardless of its color and without reference to its counterfeit resemblance to butter, and we are told that it is a legitimate exercise of police power and Federal taxation. Mr. Chairman, I would much prefer to consider this measure without regard to the selfish or local or pecuniary interests involved and entirely as an unjust, unwarranted, and dangerous attempt to promote private monopoly by special legislation, to invade the constitutional jurisdiction of the several States of the Union, to destroy freedom of interstate commerce, and to use the supreme prerogative of governmental taxation for avowedly oppressive and destructive ends. That is the comprehensive, patriotic, and prudent view to take of the matter, and it is the only view that, it seems to me, ought to prevail with gentlemen on this side of the House.

I am aware of the fact that some conscientious and able Democrats on this floor feel constrained to vote for this measure upon grounds of expediency and local loyalty; but, my friends, if we consent to such legislation in this instance upon such narrow and selfish considerations, what may we not be called upon to sanction in the future, if we are to be logical and consistent? I know that in my own case there are grave and mighty local interests constraining me to oppose the bill; but if I understand my own feelings in the matter those are not the controlling motives that lead me to raise my protest against it. Since, however, these things must necessarily have their influence in deciding men's actions, and have been already introduced as weighty arguments in the course of this debate, let us see for a moment what the local, pecuniary, purely commercial aspects of the situation are.

Who is asking for this legislation? Not the people, not the farmers, not the laboring classes, not the stockmen and stock raisers, not the great mass of those who purchase and consume the dairy products and the oleomargarine products of the country. On the contrary, the sole and supreme interest behind this and all similar bills that have come to Congress is the great dairy trust that has been building up its despotic monopoly throughout the country for the past twenty years, and now considers itself strong enough to destroy by this bill a worthy, profitable, and flourishing industry that competes with it in the markets of the Union and the world. That is all there is in the agitation and enthusiasm in favor of this bill.

I know that gentlemen here have said that they have received letters from some of their prominent farmer constituents urging the passage of the bill, but I find in a recent issue of the same paper I spoke of before, the Chicago Dairy Produce—the organ of the National Dairy Union—a form of circular letter intended to be copied and sent to Congressmen by such unwary people as could be induced to do so under the false plea that this bill is for the benefit of the farmers of the country and against the great oleomargarine trust that is polluting the food supply and defrauding the people with spurious imitations of butter. I venture to say that every letter that has been sent to members of this House from their rural constituents emanated from this Chicago propaganda, organized and manipulated by the dairy trust.

Against this bill the true farmer's interests are arrayed upon every consideration of self-protection, upon principle, and upon policy. I have the honor to represent one of the largest and most prosperous agricultural districts in this entire Republic, and I know that my people are opposed to this and all similar measures, first, because they are un-Democratic, and next, because they are antagonistic to the true farming interests of the country. The great dairy syndicates and unions of the country are not composed of farmers nor allied to the farming class in any way.

On the contrary, they work a positive injury to the real farmer. They destroy his home market for the butter that his wife and daughters make on the farm; they drive out all local competition by the monopoly they are enabled to establish under the patronage and protection of laws like this; they depreciate the value of his farm products and his stock-raising industry by practically confiscating the property and destroying the trade of the cotton-seed-oil mills, packing houses, and stock yards where he is now able to realize ready and lucrative profits from the output of his farm. I deny that any genuine farmer favors this bill or will be benefited by it.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Forty thousand in Berks County, Pa., almost all of them Democrats, are asking for this legislation.

Mr. WOOTEN. How many of them are in the dairy business?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. About 5,000.

Mr. WOOTEN. I supposed so. I say that the great farming, agricultural districts of this country—the true farming population of the United States—have not asked for this bill, do not favor the bill, and will not be benefited by it.

The laboring classes—what is known as "organized labor"—are against this measure to a man, because it takes from their tables and from the poorly supplied larders of their humble homes a cheap and wholesome article of food and turns them over to the tender mercies of the butter trust for such meager and high-priced substitute as they can afford to buy. There are hundreds of thousands of homes in the United States—the homes of the wage-earners and breadwinners in our large cities and crowded factory districts and mining camps—where not an ounce of butter or anything like it will ever go when you have struck down the oleomargarine industry and established the dairy despotism that prompts and stands sponsor for this bill. Is the poor man's lot so easy now that you can afford to take away any of its pleasures or add to any of its burdens?

And, then, the immense stock-raising interests of the West and Southwest, representing 26 States and Territories and an invested capital of more than $4,000,000,000—how do they stand toward this bill? At their last annual session in the city of Denver only two months ago they unanimously resolved to fight it with all their power and to appeal to Congress to spare them the terrible loss they will inevitably sustain if this blow is struck at them from behind the bulwarks of proscriptive taxation in the interest of private monopoly.

And, then, what is to be the effect upon the cotton-seed-oil mills of the South and upon the cotton planter who finds in them his only salvation from the ruinously low price of his cotton crop? There were in the United States, for the season of 1901–2, in operation 452 cotton-seed-oil mills, of which number 128 were in Texas, 10 in the Indian Territory, and 6 in Oklahoma. The balance were in the other Southern States. These mills represent an estimated value, in property and plant, of $30,000,000, and by the market they furnished to the farmer for his cotton seed they added one-third to the value of his cotton crop throughout that region where cotton is king, and where, until this added value was realized, the white and green colors of his royal garniture were but the badges of poverty and servitude for the struggling masses of our people. Will you strike out by one stroke of unjust and unequal Federal taxation the value of the great industry that has brought relief and hope and prosperity to the cotton fields of the new South; and will you, at the same time, practically confiscate without due process of law and destroy without compensation the $30,000,000 worth of property owned by the cotton-seed-oil mills, not for public use or benefit, but at the behest and for the benefit of the cow corporations and dairy monopolies of the Northwest?

If this bill is passed you will do all these things, and you will do more. You will inaugurate a policy and set a precedent that must lead to the vilest and most oppressive legislation that ever stained the statute books of a Republic whose motto is "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman this question: Are you in favor of the substitute bill?

Mr. WOOTEN. I am in favor of neither of these bills.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Would you invoke the interstate-commerce clause to prohibit the sending of oleo from one State to another labeled as butter and to be sold as butter?

Mr. WOOTEN. I would favor any law that has for its object the suppression of fraud.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Would you favor that kind of a law?

Mr. WOOTEN. I want to tell the gentleman that I will favor any law that is directly aimed at fraud, whether it be in oleomargarine or anything else, and I do not favor a law that abandons the plea of fraud and simply seeks by direct taxation, by an internal tariff upon the commerce between the States, to destroy a legitimate and honest industry.

Mr. LLOYD. I wish to call your attention to one other item. You referred to the live-stock association which met in Denver. That association passed this resolution:

Resolved, That we heartily approve of such legislation as the law proposed by the Wadsworth substitute.

Mr. WOOTEN. That is because, like everybody else, when they come to the horns of the altar of justice in Congress, called here by the paralyzing opposition of a great trust, they are willing to take the best that they can get. But, as a Democrat, as an opponent of special legislation, as a believer in the creed that every honest industry in this country has a right to thrive without discrimination or proscription against it, I say that I do not favor the substitute bill nor the original bill.

I may vote for the substitute as the lesser of two evils, just as this live-stock association favors the lesser of the two evils. It has gotten to that point in this country that there are great interests, honest interests, which can not come here to ask for their full rights, but they must come on bended knee and take the pitiful portion that the trusts propose to give to them in the modified substitute that the minority is compelled to submit, in lieu of what they ought to have. I say that every man who has signed the report in favor of the substitute bill knows that it is not what he wants, but he offers it as a middle ground between utter destruction, effective discrimination, tax repression against oleomargarine, and a compliance with the terms of the law as it now exists.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill is indefensible upon the highest and most substantial grounds of constitutional and political principle. It involves a doctrine and policy of Federal power and of the taxing prerogatives of the Government that can not be upheld by anyone who values the correct ideas of our governmental system, still less by any Democrat who respects the teachings and traditions of his party. The right and power of taxation is the highest and most responsible function that pertains to any government, and in a free government like this it is the one prerogative that approaches to royalty in its capacity for promoting or destroying private interests and public prosperity.

We all know that the first great parliamentary struggle in England to maintain the principles of English constitutional law was the fight against the Crown monopolies that were being built up by the special and unusual advantages conferred upon them by the royal prerogative—patronage and favor. We can have no crown monopolies here, but we can have and we are rapidly fostering great syndicates and combinations of corporate and financial monopoly by the taxing power and patronage of the Federal Government. The trusts and corporations that are being enriched for private benefit at the public expense, and under the guise of protective tariffs and such internal taxation as that involved in this bill, are in every respect similar to and equally pernicious with the Crown monopolies that roused to activity and vehement parliamentary protest the patriots and statesmen of Elizabeth's time in England. Then we have seen how the same kind of policy made miserable the lot of the colonies that once belonged to such countries as Spain in her days of splendor and prowess.

A great deal has been said during the past three years about imperialism, but almost too much attention has been paid to its territorial and colonial aspects. We have felt the dangers of the imperial ideas of government as applied to the acquisition of foreign territory and the despotism of military occupation of distant colonies of alien races; but we have not fully realized the disasters and dangers of imperialism as practiced and promoted by the policies and administration of the dominant party at home. We have been dealing with imperialism at long range, but we must very soon deal with it at our own doors and in the midst of our own social, industrial, and political affairs.

Measures like this one demonstrate all the pernicious and destructive operations of the imperial theory of taxation. For three centuries imperial Spain governed her colonies and her own soil and citizenship under a system of government-protected monopolies precisely as we are now asked to build up and protect this one. The Crown claimed and enforced a monopoly in all the necessaries of life, and farmed them out to the favored persons and corporations who would render in return the most valued subserviency to the royal will. Salt, tobacco, gunpowder, the precious metals were all claimed as the special prerogatives of the King, and were protected from private use and commercial competition by the most onerous and odious restrictions and the heaviest burdens of taxation. Every avocation of business and every pursuit of private industry was subjected to the vigilant tyranny of royal monopoly and administered as a means of filling the coffers of the Kingdom and enriching the favorites of the Crown.

The whole land swarmed with Government agents, taxgatherers, spies, and the hireling emissaries of this system of private monopoly at public expense. That was Spanish imperialism as administered to her American colonies, and it left to them a legacy of misery, poverty, bondage, and ruin that ultimately filled her possessions with woe, bloodshed, and unending revolution.

We are to-day preparing to pursue, if we are not already practicing, the very same methods in some of those colonies that we have wrested from Spanish tyranny, and, worst of all, we are inaugurating by measures like this the same system of Government protection and legalized monopoly on American soil and among American industries.

Against such a theory and practice of Federal power the Democratic party has set its face like flint ever since it began to teach and to defend the true constitutional rules of Federal jurisdiction. According to the historic contention of the Democratic party the power and right of taxation rest entirely upon the ground of public necessity—taxes can be justly and constitutionally imposed only for the purpose of raising revenues to pay the expenses of the Government honestly and economically administered. From the days of Jefferson that has been and is to-day the only true and consistent Democratic position. The party has never recognized and indorsed the use of Federal taxation for police purposes. It belongs in no just and proper sense to the Federal Government to exercise police power over the affairs belonging to the States, and least of all can that power be enforced by the levying and collecting of taxes. If the Democratic party ever sanctions and adopts that policy it must abandon every great doctrine and stultify every historic declaration it has espoused in the past.

Gentlemen have quoted in this debate, as a justification for the admitted discrimination and destruction that are intended and involved by this bill, the famous utterance of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Maryland v. McCulloch, that "the power to tax is the power to destroy." Judge Marshall did not announce that proposition with approbation nor advance it as an argument to justify the prostitution of the taxing power for private ends under the pretext of police regulation. He merely stated a fact: he did not declare a doctrine. Like every other great function of government, taxation may be used for unrighteous as well as righteous ends, and in that sense it involves the power to proscribe, to discriminate, and finally to destroy. When it is so used, it becomes the worst form of tyranny, for it promotes private monopoly and confers special privileges upon those who enjoy its benefits, while it ostracises, impoverishes, and crushes those who bear its burdens.

I was startled the other day to hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] eulogize Thomas Jefferson and invoke his authority against this bill. Coming as it did, from that side of the Chamber, it seemed to me to carry the force of a rebuke to some on this side who claim a closer loyalty to the teachings of the father of American Democracy. It is indeed true that this bill contravenes every tenet and teaching of Thomas Jefferson, not only as it violates and invades the reserved constitutional rights of the several States, but as it despises and destroys every doctrine of uniform and equal taxation, and establishes the principle of private monopoly at public expense.

But the gentleman from Illinois avowed himself a follower of Jefferson's great antagonist, Alexander Hamilton, and I wondered that he did not recognize the paternity of this bill in the precepts of the great Federalist. This kind of legislation can trace an unbroken lineal descent from the teachings of Alexander Hamilton. In his great report on "manufactures and commerce" he declared that it should be the policy and the purpose of the Federal Government "to foster and build up certain special industrial and commercial interests, which would in turn become the bulwarks of the Government." Pursuant to that policy and purpose he advocated a national banking system, supported by a perpetual national indebtedness (which he paradoxically declared to be a national blessing), in order to solidify and strengthen the moneyed interests of the country as a bulwark of Federal power and prerogative, and later on the taxing power was invoked to proscribe and destroy State banks. That policy has given us the present system of national banks, with their practical monopoly of financial influence and their despotism over the so-called "business interests" of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, a little while ago I rose and asked for ten minutes additional time to be given to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. I did not know at the time that it was to come out of any gentleman's time on this side of the House. I find out since that it was curtailing the time of the gentleman from Texas. I now ask the House to give him ten minutes additional time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I understand there are only sixteen minutes time left on this side. I shall not object to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee if the committee, by unanimous consent, will allow me a half hour to-morrow morning in which to close the debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What is the request, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. SIMS. The request is to give the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WOOTEN] ten minutes additional time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have no objection to that request, but any request that involves any time to be taken to-morrow from the debate under the five-minute rule and devote it to general debate I shall object to.

Mr. SIMS. I made a request for ten minutes additional time for the gentleman from Wyoming, not knowing that it was curtailing anybody else. I now find that it is actually taken from the time of the gentleman from Texas, and I ask that he be given ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended for ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Chairman, I was proceeding to show that this character of legislation is in direct line with the Hamiltonian theory of building up private interests at public expense, in order that they may become the bulwarks of the supporters of that policy and of the Administration that favors that line of legislation. I spoke of the national banks as one of the factors in the carrying out of that theory. Then Hamilton proposed a system of protective tariffs to foster manufacturing monopolies at home and to bar out commercial competition from abroad. That policy, under the fruitful manipulation of Hamilton's political descendants, has given us the enormous industrial syndicates and trusts that to-day dominate the trade, transportation, manufactures, and even the legislation of the Republic. It has given us a national oil, under the patronage of the Standard Oil Company; it has given us national monopolies in wire, steel, iron, coal, copper, glass, tobacco, sugar, and almost every other commodity of commerce. Now the same policy proposes to give us a national butter monopoly in the hands of the National Dairy Union and under the pretext of a police regulation against oleomargarine.

The tariff has fostered the trusts by building a barrier against the outside world and enabling the great corporations to establish their despotism by uninterrupted spoliation of the American people; and now the same school of political philosophy—the school of Hamilton and the Federalists—proposes by legislation like this to put the same policy of discrimination and proscription into practice at home by inaugurating a system of internal tariffs upon interstate commerce, using the Federal powers of taxation and police regulation to destroy one industry in order to enrich another. It is only a question of time—not a very long time—when every other interest that is active and influential enough to make itself heard will be clamoring for similar protection and patronage under the guise of police regulation. The beet-sugar industry will want legislation against the cane-sugar industry, and vice versa.

The manufacturers of silken and woolen goods will want regulation by taxation against the makers of mixed and mercerized goods. Already the flour mills are asking for taxation against mixed flours. Even the dairymen will begin to fight each other, and the cow will begin to bellow against those of her own kind who are not up to a proper standard of breeding and milk production. I saw lately a bulletin from the Bureau of Animal Industry containing the report of a veterinary expert who says that all Jersey cattle are infected with tuberculosis and are congenitally inflicted with pleuropneumonia. He pointed out how the breed came originally from the bleak and inhospitable island of Jersey or Guernsey, where they acquired the taint of pulmonary disease, and he graphically declared that "the very color of their hair bears the hectic flush of incipient consumption." Consequently, he advises that the time must come, sooner or later, when steps must be taken to get rid of Jersey dairies by exterminating Jersey cattle. Imagine what a flood of bills like this will come into this House when the National Dairy Union begins to discriminate bebetween the different breeds of milch cows.

Mr. Chairman, such legislation is wrong in principle, dangerous in practice, ruinous in all its logical consequences and tendencies. Once inaugurated, no man can foresee its result or prophesy its end. It involves a radical departure from the true principles of Federal taxation, an unconstitutional exercise of Federal power, an unwarranted invasion of State sovereignty, a palpable interference with interstate commerce. Nobody asks for it but the butter trust, whose industry it is intended to nationalize and to monopolize. It will drive out and destroy a great, a desirable, a profitable, and a beneficial industry in order to raise the price of butter for the dairyman and to cement the despotism of the cow and the cow corporations over the food supply of the whole country. [Apuplase.]

[Mr. GAINES of Tennessee addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise; and pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent for general leave to print. There are a number of gentlemen who have not had an opportunity to speak on this bill who desire to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that the request ought to be submitted to the House. The question is on the motion that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9206 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT ON OLEOMARGARINE BILL.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general leave to print be granted in view of the fact that a number of gentlemen have not had an opportunity to speak.

Mr. PAYNE. Within what time?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Within ten days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that general leave to print may be had for ten days.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to know whether this is to be on all questions or is it confined to the oleomargarine bill?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Confined to the oleomargarine bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, as debate has been general, it has been on quite a number of subjects, not all of them confined to the oleomargarine bill, and it seems to be an injustice to these gentlemen to now confine their extensions to the oleo question when they discussed some other question. I have not made any speech; it is nothing to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut amends his request by adding that the discussion shall be confined to the oleomargarine bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I was engaged in conversation, or some one in conversation with me, and I did not hear the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will restate it. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that general leave to print be given all members of the House for ten days, the remarks to be confined to the pending bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

POLITICAL STATUS OF FILIPINOS.

Mr. CARMACK. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read the first and second times by its title and lie over, as I may desire to address the Senate upon it.

The joint resolution (S. R. 54) regarding the political status of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands was read the first time by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee requests that the joint resolution lie upon the table.

Mr. SPOONER. Let it be read in full.

Mr. CARMACK. Yes; I should like to have it read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate, etc., That the United States regard with extreme disfavor any movement having for its object the early or ultimate admission of the Philippine Islands as a State or States of the Union; and any action on the part of persons holding office under the authority of the United States that gives sanction or encouragement to such a movement is hereby condemned.

That to confer the rights and privileges of citizens upon the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands would tend to destroy the integrity of the citizenship and to degrade the character of the Government of the United States.

That to maintain the relation of sovereign and subject between the Government of the United States and a people under its dominion would be repugnant to the principles of the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Tennessee, the joint resolution will be printed and lie upon the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the concurrent resolution which has just come from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed, in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 9315, "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes," to insert the word "thirteenth" on page 9, in line 9, in lieu of the word "thirtieth."

Mr. HALE. The concurrent resolution simply makes the date of the act conform to the statute, and I ask that it be put on its passage.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the Calendar may be proceeded with for a short time.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the time until 1 o'clock for the Calendar of unobjected cases.

Mr. LODGE. I should be very glad to go on with the Calendar, as the Senator knows, but I feel bound to press the Philippine bill for consideration. It is standing in the way of a great many bills, the passage of which is desired, and I am most anxious to bring it to a conclusion. I see no way to bring it to a conclusion except to keep it before the Senate. Therefore I shall move that we proceed——

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the Senator would facilitate the passage of all bills, as well as those on the Calendar, by giving a reasonable time to the Calendar, and not compel Senators to be getting up now and then all the way through the proceedings and asking for the consideration of this and that bill. That has been my experience. However, the Senator can pursue his own course.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope we may go on with the Calendar for a while.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; I can not resist the appeal of the Senator from Missouri. I will yield until 1 o'clock to the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, let the Calendar under the rule be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. As an order has been made for the consideration of pension bills, I suggest that they be passed over as they are reached, and that we simply take up the other bills on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to passing by all the pension bills, there being an order that an hour on Friday next shall be given for the consideration of those bills? The Chair hears none.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. COCKRELL. No, Mr. President; I hope the Senator will not ask for anything. We have gotten to the Calendar once.

Mr. HOAR. Am I entitled to make my request before the Senator interposes?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator will consume that much more time. He will have it objected to; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to state that I desire to ask unanimous consent to give precedence in the consideration of the Calendar to Senate joint resolution No. 2 on the Calendar, and I will state the reason. I am obliged to leave Washington for home for an indefinite period, at any rate for several days, the latter part of this week. This is an amendment to the Constitution, which has twice passed the Senate unanimously.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read, then.

Mr. HOAR. I wish my friend would allow me to complete my statement.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wanted to have the joint resolution passed; that is the only reason.

Mr. HOAR. I think it would be a more decorous and proper way to allow me to complete my statement. The joint resolution consists of only half a dozen lines, and it ought to go to the State legislatures at once. I ask that it be read. I was rather impatient in my reply. I beg pardon of my friend from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the commencement and termination of Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the day fixed?

Mr. HOAR. The last Thursday of April, the day Washington was inaugurated.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the joint resolution will be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will let it be passed.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 11, at the beginning of the line, to strike out "Wednesday" and insert "Thursday;" and in line 12 to strike out "Wednesday" and insert "Thursday;" so as to read:

That the Fifty-eighth Congress and the term of office of the President and Vice-President shall continue until the last Thursday of April, in the year 1905, at noon; and the last Thursday of April, at noon, shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th day of March as the commencement and termination of Congress and of the terms of the President, Vice-President, Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the joint resolution:

And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the last Thursday in April next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, as to the latter clause, I see every reason to favor it and nothing against it. As to changing the day of inauguration I see many objections.

It contemplates a larger display in better weather than we ordinarily have on those occasions. I think those displays are dangerous, and that in the case of a disputed election we might have a revolution. We saw the country trembling on the verge of a revolution in 1876, when there was a disputed election. The provision changes the time to a warmer and more pleasant season, and that will bring more of the military from the various States here, and we will increase the danger by such a change.

I think that is a critical point in the history of our country. It has been the experience of all governments that the danger of change and revolution occurs at the time of a change of government. In all monarchical governments they have now, I believe, in every instance, the sovereign sworn in, and the inauguration or coronation, or whatever it is called, takes place months afterwards. The coronation ceremonies of King Edward are going to occur hereafter. That has been a precaution taken by that country. Republics have had the same difficulty. I think if we are going to make a change the President should be sworn in privately, and the ceremonies should occur afterwards, and let the military of the various States come here then.

Mr. HOAR. That can be done by law. That does not require a constitutional amendment.

Mr. STEWART. If that is the only object, and if it can be done by law, why not do it by law? The only reason for this is to have the ceremonies at a more pleasant season of the year.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, this provision giving us a reasonably long second session of Congress and all that can not be done by law.

Mr. STEWART. I do not see any necessity for that.

Mr. HOAR. We can change the inauguration at any time.

Mr. STEWART. I do not see why we should lengthen the term of service of those now in office. It will be like the back pay, and if we lengthen our term there will be about as much of a howl about it as there was about the back pay.

The point is to have better weather for inauguration. The Senator from Massachusetts says that that can be done by legislation. Let us have it done by legislation. Have all the display you please, but do not have the military of all the States here and the town full of people at the time the new President comes into office. If you do, you take the chances of danger and of having a revolution at that period.

I have rather congratulated myself that the 4th of March was usually a very bad day and that it prevented such a large crowd as would have otherwise come here. I think it is the very best day we could have; it is about the most boisterous day; but if you change the inauguration to the last Thursday of April, when there is good weather, you will have the whole country here. We do not want to have the country here when any solemn duty like swearing in a President takes place. That, I think, ought to be avoided.

I think there is serious objections to this change. There is the objection I have stated, and there are many others which might be stated. I do not think the joint resolution ought to be passed in the morning hour under the five-minute rule. While I have not exceeded that time, perhaps others may want to debate it at greater length, and I hope the joint resolution will go over. I shall object to its consideration in this perfunctory way. Let Senators have a chance to discuss it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada objects to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that the Chair had asked for objection, and no objection being made, the Senate considered it and adopted the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, notwithstanding the objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certain amendments have been made. If there be no further amendments, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to have the joint resolution read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read as it is now amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As amended, it will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution as amended, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed for ratification by the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by legislatures in three-fourths of the United States, shall be valid as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

That the Fifty-eighth Congress and the term of office of the President and Vice-President shall continue until the last Thursday of April, in the year 1905, at noon; and the last Thursday of April, at noon, shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th day of March as the commencement and termination of Congress and of the terms of the President, Vice-President, Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the last Thursday in April next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if the last clause does not need a little amendment? It provides that in case the House of Representatives, where it has the duty devolved upon it, shall fail to elect a President the Vice-President shall exercise the duties of the office. The Senator will note the fact that under the law the House of Representatives in such a case would probably be charged at the same time with the choice of a Vice-President.

Mr. HOAR. No; the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Of course; the misstatement as to the House was a mere inadvertence on my part.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire——

Mr. BACON. I think still, if the Senator from Texas will pardon me, that it does not change the point which was in my mind when I made the statement.

Mr. HOAR. It is a mere reenactment as applicable to the last Thursday in April of the provision in the present Constitution. There is no change.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment? I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in case the House should fail to elect a President, but the Senate should elect a Vice-President—that is the point I am coming to—the amendment leaves it in doubt as to whether it refers to the President who is in office prior to that date or the one who shall then be elected; and it seems to me that that ought to be definitely stated.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think there can be any doubt. It is a precise copy of the language of the existing Constitution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does not the provision simply make the Constitution as it is applicable to the new condition and extend the time from February to April?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; but let me state it a little more fully. It will take but a moment.

There was no provision for the Vice-President succeeding where the President-elect died before taking the oath. That has been provided for by another amendment to the Constitution which passed the Senate. This transfers all the constitutional mechanism now applicable to the 4th of March, that is, to the four years' term which began on the 4th of March when we started, to the last Thursday in April.

The provision of the Constitution is that if before the expiration of the term on the 4th of March the House has not elected a President, there being a failure by the electors, then the Vice-President who has been elected by the Senate shall succeed. The only change here is that it says if they do not do it by the last Thursday in April then the Vice-President shall take the office. There is absolutely no other change.

Mr. BACON. I understand that, and I hope the Senator will let me state the point I make, which he has not answered so far as I am able to understand.

Suppose that the House fails to elect a President and the Senate elects a Vice-President, I understand from what the Senator says that in that case the Vice-President thus elected would under this amendment exercise the duties of the office. Am I correct?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Now, I want to put the further question. Suppose the House fails to elect a President and the Senate fails to elect a Vice-President, does this amendment mean that the Vice-President of the former Administration shall take the office?

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. BACON. As I understand the Senator, then, the amendment does not provide for a case where there will be a failure both on the part of the House to elect a President and on the part of the Senate to elect a Vice-President.

Mr. HOAR. That is provided for in the other constitutional amendment which has passed. When there is not anyone entitled to succeed, Congress has provided previously by law upon what officer the duties shall devolve.

The provision which the Senator now calls attention to is that if the House do not elect a President the Vice-President shall succeed. He has been already elected by the Senate. It can not be the old Vice-President, because he is not to succeed until the previous term has expired, on the fourth Thursday of April. So, of course, the newly elected Vice-President who has taken the oath, and who is always, in fact, sworn in before the President, succeeds. I do not see how we could make it any clearer or simpler. It could not be applicable to the old Vice-President.

Mr. BACON. If it necessarily means what the Senator says, of course its simplicity is apparent, but the reply of the Senator that it can not be the Vice-President of the preceding Administration is not, it seems to me, conclusive, because if we should choose to make it so we could do it by a constitutional amendment.

Mr. HOAR. But we have not made it so.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I did not hear the first part of his remarks. My attention was turned in a different direction at the time, and I do not know whether the fact has been stated to him that the only effect of this amendment is to substitute the last Thursday of April for the 4th day of March in the Constitution as it now stands. We do not change the rule at all, but simply the date when the rule shall operate. For instance, if the Senator will take the Constitution, Rules, and Manual, and turn to page 218 he will find the following clause in the latter part of Article XII of the amendments to the Constitution:

> And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

If the Senator will read the amendment here proposed, he will find that it is but a repetition of that exact language, without any change whatever except only as to the date named; that is to say, instead of providing "before the 4th day of March next," this amendment provides "before the last Thursday in April," so that there is no change whatever in the constitutional rule on that point. It was the object of the committee in adopting that language to simply make the amendment operative throughout and put everything in harmony.

Mr. BACON. I find that I am in error. I was not aware of the fact, Mr. President, that the language had been followed exactly. In fact, I do not see why, if there is no amendment to that clause, it should have been repeated in this legislation.

Mr. HOAR. Because the last Thursday of April has to be substituted for the 4th of March. That is the change.

Mr. BACON. I see. The Senator is right.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed (two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative).

WILLIAM B. THOMPSON.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that we begin the Calendar at Order of Business 239 (Senate bill 39). The other cases will have to be passed over, and I make this suggestion so as not to waste time in calling those before that number.

The bill (S. 39) to correct the military record of William B. Thompson was announced as first in order on the Calendar; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of War to correct the military record of William B. Thompson, Company C, Sixty-third Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers, by removing therefrom the word "deserted" and substituting therefor the words "absented himself without proper authority, and was, on writ of habeas corpus, by the civil authorities, in September, 1862, discharged at Indianapolis, Ind., being under 21 years of age."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OVERLAND EXPEDITION TO POINT BARROW.

The joint resolution (S. R. 39) recognizing the able and gallant services of Capt. Francis Tuttle, Revenue-Cutter Service, his officers and men of the Bear; also the heroic services of Lieuts. David H. Jarvis, Ellsworth P. Bertholf, and Dr. Samuel J. Call, composing the overland expedition to Point Barrow, Arctic Ocean, for the relief of imperiled whalers was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY. I want to amend the joint resolution by providing for a silver reproduction of that medal for the sailors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. The joint resolution refers to the officers and crew all the way through.

Mr. LODGE. According to the title the men are included.

Mr. HAWLEY. If that be so, very good. I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. They are not included in the body of the joint resolution, I think.

Mr. COCKRELL. In the body of the joint resolution the officers and crew are both referred to.

Mr. SPOONER. But the men are not included in the medal clause.

Mr. HAWLEY. They ought to be.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from Connecticut waive his amendment?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do, because I now understand that the sailors are already included.

Mr. SPOONER. No; they are not.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are mentioned in the body of the joint resolution, but they are not included in the medal clause.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I renew my amendment providing a silver medal for the sailors of that expedition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "expedition," in line 15, it is proposed to insert:

> And a silver medal of an appropriate design, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to be awarded to each of the sailors of said overland expedition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the Senator had better withdraw the joint resolution for the present and prepare an amendment, whilst the Senate proceeds with the consideration of other bills on the Calendar. There will have to be an appropriation for the sailors' medals, the same as for the others.

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest that the bill be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. SPOONER subsequently said:

I ask that Senate joint resolution No. 39, which was passed over a moment ago, may be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the joint resolution will be considered before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPOONER. I find on examination that the joint resolution needs no amendment. It is drawn in exact accord with the recommendation of President McKinley in his message of June 17, 1899, to thank the captain and officers and men of the revenue cutter Bear, separately giving the thanks of Congress to these four officers, and providing for medals. They are the men, and the only men, who composed the relief in the overland expedition.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does it provide for the common sailors as well as the officers?

Mr. SPOONER. It gives to the common sailors, just what it gives to the captain and officers of the Bear, the thanks of Congress; but it gives separately the thanks of Congress and a gold medal to the four officers who alone constituted the overland expedition.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GAINESVILLE, TEX.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1539) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Gainesville, in the State of Texas.

The bill was read: and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and to contract for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Gainesville and State of Texas, the cost of the site and building, including vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed $80,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRADE STATISTICS.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill to which there will be no objection.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask that the Calendar be proceeded with, according to the agreement.

Mr. LODGE. The agreement was to go on with the Calendar regularly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 2479) to facilitate the procurement of statistics of trade between the United States and contiguous territory over which it exercises control was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill will be passed over without prejudice.

SUBPORT OF ENTRY AT NACO, ARIZ.

The bill (S. 2848) for the establishment of a subport of entry at Naco, Ariz., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOLS OF MINING AND METALLURGY.

The bill (S. 634) to apply a portion of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands to the endowment, support, and maintenance of schools or departments of mining and metallurgy in the several States and Territories in connection with the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts established in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill be passed over without prejudice. It would consume too much time to consider it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

FOG SIGNAL AT PIEDRAS BLANCAS, CAL.

The bill (S. 3128) to establish a fog signal and a keeper's dwelling at Piedras Blancas, Cal., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to establish at Piedras Blancas, Cal., a fog signal and a dwelling for a keeper, at a cost not to exceed $15,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONUMENT TO DOROTHEA LYNDE DIX.

The joint resolution (S. R. 30) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Dorothea Lynde Dix was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $10,000 for the purpose of preparing and improving a site and erecting and completing the erection of a monument to the memory of Dorothea Lynde Dix on the property now owned by the National Dorothea Dix Memorial Association at Hampden, Me., and provides that the plan for the improvement of the site and the design for the monument shall be selected and approved by a commission to consist of the Secretary of War, the president of the National Dorothea Dix Memorial Association, and the chairman of the committee of the Society of the Army of the Potomac on the Dorothea Dix memorial, and that the appropriation of $10,000 shall be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of War, but not until a good and clear title to the site and access thereto shall be vested in the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I had supposed that monument was to be erected in Washington. I did not know it was to be erected outside of Washington. It seems to me we shall be opening up a very large question if we go into the building of monuments in the States. I do not know where this monument is to be placed; but if it is to be placed outside of Washington I should like to consider the joint resolution further before I assent to it. I must object now.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in view of the action of the Senate in erecting a monument to that distinguished patriot and martyr, General Warren, at Roxbury, Mass., I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not now object to the same principle being applied here to the memory of this most illustrious woman and philanthropist. The record of the world shows no such history of devotion and self-sacrifice of health and fortune and life as Dorothea Lynde Dix conferred upon mankind by her great services for more than forty years. The little sum of $10,000 is asked for a monument to be placed where she sleeps to-day, on land owned by the National Dorothea Dix Memorial Association. Already, as I have said, the Senate has taken ground in that direction. Not many of these monuments will ever be erected outside of Washington; but whenever a case like this, or a case like that of General Warren, is presented, I will, for one, vote to make an exception and erect the monument.

Mr. LODGE. I was not aware that we had made exceptions of that kind. If that is the case, I have no desire to press an objection. My objection was not, as the Senator well knows, to a monument to Dorothea Lynde Dix.

Mr. HOAR. I will remind my colleague of the case of Gen. George Rogers Clark, which was passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I can not forbear from expressing my entire concurrence with the remarks of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I had the honor of a considerable acquaintance with this most distinguished woman. I knew something of her labors in various fields of charity and well-doing, and I will vote for anything in her honor.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8581) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BARNEY, Mr. VAN VOORHIS, and Mr. BELL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8581) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PRITCHARD, and Mr. TURNER were appointed.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill 5833, being the Philippine tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending motion is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. STEWART. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to allow me a moment in order that I may ask for the consideration of a bill to which there will be no objection.

Mr. LODGE. I yielded for an hour to allow bills on the Calendar to be taken up. I must object to other bills after having yielded so long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, as I said yesterday, I do not intend in what I shall say to go into the question of our power to hold territory nonadjacent to the United States, nor do I intend to discuss the legal question involved. I said more than two years ago that I did not think the question whether or not we should hold those islands was in controversy. I felt certain from the hour that Dewey went into the harbor of Manila that we should be compelled to have some relations with those people, and that those relations must be of more than a commercial character.

I believe that those islands, if we have to hold them as we are now holding them, will not be profitable and can not be made profitable. I myself have never believed they could be made profitable; and yet I have believed that for certain reasons it was a proper thing for the Government of the United States to have a closer relation with them than they have with any other country. I have believed that in the hands of certain European or Asiatic powers those islands would be dangerous to us. For that reason, and for that reason alone, I believe it well that we should maintain, if possible, friendly relations with the people of the Philippine Archipelago. But I have never supposed that there would be an attempt on our part to take and hold and own the islands in the complete sense of the term. I am sure when the treaty with Spain was before the Senate that that result was not anticipated by any member of this body, and I am sure that the party in power did not contemplate at that time the present existing condition of things.

I want now to repeat that I do not believe any profit can be made by holding the islands commercially if we have to hold them by force. Not only is it contrary to our principles of government, but it is contrary to our interests to hold any people in subjection or compel them to give us commercial privileges and opportunities which they do not give to other nations. I had supposed that if we were to accept this as a question unsettled, the first problem would be, perhaps, to determine what our rights may be there. Inasmuch as there is nobody in the world save the Filipino who can challenge the right of the United States to hold or not to hold those islands, and nobody is likely to do so, and nobody would be allowed to do so if anyone should attempt it——

Mr. SPOONER. Except here.

Mr. TELLER. It is not worth while, therefore, outside of the American Congress, where it is a proper subject of debate, to consider that question. Inasmuch as we have been told by those in authority and by the friends of the Administration on this floor and elsewhere that there was no question about the continued attempt to dominate those islands, I do not propose to go into that subject to any great extent.

I myself believe, Mr. President, that had there been a wise administration of affairs with reference to the islands there need not have been the unhappy condition which now exists. I believe there need have been no war. I am not now going to stop to determine where the trouble came from, whether from the Army or from the Executive branch of the Government. It is enough to say that we got into a war—a war that has existed for nearly if not quite three years—a war, Mr. President, which, if officers of the Army of the United States are to be depended upon, is as likely to continue for the next ten, fifteen, or twenty years as when it began it was likely to continue for three years.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], who preceded me yesterday, went into an elaborate discussion, which I think was pertinent enough for those who choose to indulge in it, to show that we had no right in the Philippines whatever. I myself think that we are there wrongfully; and yet I know that any considerable discussion of that question here and now under present conditions would be a waste of time.

As I said two years ago, the thing for us to address ourselves to is what is to be the relation of those people to us, and not whether or not we have the power, if we see fit to exercise it, simply to hold their country.

I am not alarmed by anything which has been said about "scuttle;" that it would be undignified and cowardly for us to leave the islands. That does not disturb me. I think if we are in the islands, no matter whether rightfully or wrongfully, if it is not to the interest of the American people that we should remain there, we ought to get away. Will anybody dispute that proposition? Is there incumbent upon us a duty so great that we are compelled to stay there, as we are staying, undoubtedly, against the will of 95 per cent of that population? I put the number thus large because, whatever may be said of it, I do not believe that there is any considerable number of the people of the islands who would not be glad to see the United States Army leave there and all attempts at government on our part abandoned.

I wish the conditions were otherwise than they are. I wish we could have remained there with the consent of the people, not for the profit we shall be able to realize from them commercially, but for the benefit which we might have conferred upon them. But is there anybody here who believes that we can force a government on those people contrary to their wishes? Does anybody here believe that we can force a civilization and a culture upon them contrary to their desires? Has that result ever been accomplished in the history of the world? The Filipinos are a tropical people; they are of an entirely different race from that to which we belong; they have none of the ideas of government which we have, and they will not entertain such ideas. Even with our tutelage, even with all our efforts, they will have nothing of it, because our idea of government does not commend itself to the southern or oriental races. Government to the Asiatic mind is an entirely different thing from government in the mind of the Anglo-Saxon. In the whole history of mankind there has never been an Asiatic people which has risen to the high conception of the rights of man entertained by the Anglo-Saxon. A government suited to our condition, and which would be desirable for us, is not suited to them, nor would it be desirable for them. The President of the United States says with truth that no nation has ever been able to fit and prepare a tropical people for a free government, as free government is understood by us. He might have extended that remark so as to embrace all Asiatic people if he had chosen to do so, and, more than that, he might have extended it to all the peoples of the world.

I aver here—and if any Senator can find that I am mistaken, I shall be glad to have him point out the instance—that in the whole history of the world no nation has ever elevated another nation when that nation resisted and objected to the attempt at elevation. Nay, more, Mr. President, no nation has ever elevated itself from a low degree to a higher plane of mental and political condition by the assistance of any other people in the world, except as an example.

The world is full of failures. Every attempt, I believe, that the Roman people made was a failure, unless it may be said they met some degree of success in Gaul; and what was accomplished there consumed more time in its accomplishment than the people of the United States will be willing to give to their effort at tutelage and education in the Philippine Islands.

Fifty-five years before the Christian era the Romans, in the very height and splendor of their intellectual attainments, attempted to force their civilization upon the Britons, and when they had been in England two centuries they were still holding their position there, not with the consent of the people, but against their will. History records the fact that when they had been there two hundred and sixty-five years in the attempt to Romanize and civilize the Britons, they sacrificed in one single year 50,000 Roman soldiers. When after four hundred and some odd years of attempted domination Rome took away her army, she took away to a large degree her civilization with it, and she left the people of those islands in such a demoralized, such a helpless condition, that they became the prey for the next four hundred years of the robbers of the world.

Historian Green speaks of the condition in which England was left, and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to his remarks. In Green's Short History of the English People, page 5, we read:

> The wealth of the island grew fast during centuries of unbroken peace, but the evils which were slowly sapping the strength of the Roman Empire at large must have told heavily on the real wealth of the province of Britain. Here, as in Italy or Gaul, the population probably declined as the estates of the landed proprietors grew larger, and the cultivators sank into serfs, whose cabins clustered around the luxurious villas of their lords. The mines, if worked by forced labor, must have been a source of endless oppression. Town and country were alike crushed by heavy taxation, while industry was checked by a system of trade guilds which confined each occupation to an hereditary caste. Above all, the purely despotic system of the Roman Government, by crushing all local independence, crushed all local vigor. Men forgot how to fight for their country when they forgot how to govern it.

There is a whole chapter of human history in a few lines. That has been the history of every attempt to dominate a people of considerable numbers, although the domination may have been attempted by the superior race, and, as we think, the race better fitted for government.

I might mention a great number of cases in the history of the world, but it is not necessary to do so. I simply declare, as a proposition unassailable and uncontradictable, that if ever a people are elevated, the elevation must be accomplished by their own efforts. I do not mean to say that a country like ours can not have, and that it has not had, great influence on the people of the world and incited them to better conditions, because it is true that its influence has been felt.

I have no doubt that the example of the colonies in their fight for independence and in the good government they established after they had attained their independence brought on the great contest which soon followed, and in which all of the European world participated, and out of which grew, whatever you may say of the tyranny of Napoleon, and although with bloodshed and disaster to all the people who participated in it, more for the human race than has been attained in any other two hundred and fifty or five hundred years in human history. It was Napoleon who broke the strength of the theory of the divine right of kings. I have not any doubt myself that Lafayette, with his conception of American government and American freedom, was an important factor in bringing on, though unintentionally on his part, the great French rebellion against the constituted authorities. Wicked as that revolution was in many details, yet out of it came infinite good. But our influence was then, and it should ever be, that of an exemplar, and we should not attempt, Mahomet-like, to enforce upon other people our civil, political, or religious views.

DOCTRINE OF DESTINY.

I think I may safely assert that it is not the duty of any individual or nation to attempt an impossible task, or to attempt a task difficult in the extreme unless it is to be followed by great good. We have attempted that task, sometimes under the pretense that it was to bring a commercial advantage to us, sometimes under the pretense that destiny or Providence had imposed the duty on us. I do not know what men mean when they tell us that destiny has required us to do a certain thing. Do they mean, in the case of the Philippines, that the Omnipotent has decreed that we shall enter upon a period of spoliation and war, and that with blood and bayonets, and swords, and the thundering of cannon we shall force upon the people of the Philippine Islands that which we think is good for them and that which they think they know is not good for them? If I had such conceptions of Deity, I should have to change every sentiment of my heart, and I do not believe it is much less than sacrilege to say that the Almighty demands this sacrifice of us.

I should want, before I engaged in it, a plain edict from the Almighty. It would have to come, not as the oracles came to the old Greeks, not as they came to the heathen world when it professed to hear the voice of its gods. I should want to know that it was the voice of the good God and that it was not the prompting of the evil one. I could imagine that the methods we are pursuing might emanate from the god of evil and wickedness, but I can not conceive how they could emanate from the Lover of the human race, from that God who is Love.

If I could hear the directing voice of the Almighty in this matter, and could thus be made to feel that it was a duty incumbent upon us to carry our civilization to the Philippine Islands, I would not hesitate, no matter what the cost. But I insist that His voice has not been heard in this question. I insist that if there is any reason why we should be there it can not be found in the command of Deity.

OPPOSED TO AMERICAN INTERESTS.

Mr. President, it is equally certain to me that the interest of the United States does not demand our presence in the Philippines on our present footing. It is equally certain to me that even if we should get rid of the question of morals, if we should forget that nations must respond for wrongdoing like men, if we should forget every page of our history, if we should forget what our fathers declared over and over again, and what they went to war for—the maintenance of a principle—that governments are instituted by men for the benefit of men, and their just powers are derived from the consent of the governed—if we should forget that in the interest of commercialism, I insist that there is no such demand on us, for no man can stand in this Chamber and show me that in a generation, or in ten generations, can we be compensated by the trade there for what we have already sacrificed and suffered, and that against the will and protest of the people who rightfully own and should control, according to American ideas, the land in which they live.

Now, after nearly three years of conflict, after years of actual warfare, with a large army in the Philippines—I am told that already 120,000 men have been there—what is the situation? How many we have left there, and how many have returned to go to early graves, how much evil we have inflicted upon our people by that course, independent of the cost in dollars and cents, God alone knows. No human being can tell us to-day what will be the influence upon a great army there amidst all the temptations and vices of a tropical climate and among a tropical people.

It remains yet to be determined by the future how much we are to be damaged, not alone in our purse, but how much we are to be cursed in our physical and mental and moral manhood.

There are some things difficult to speak about in public. I shall be pardoned, I hope, when I say that if the Army surgeons there are to be trusted, we shall receive a curse of curses, not only in this generation, but in the generations to come. The blood of the American citizen will be contaminated by a vice which flourishes, especially in tropical countries, to an extent never heard of before in this or any other civilized country, in my opinion. That remains for the future.

I can measure the dollars; I can count what it costs in that respect; I can consider what it takes out of the pockets of the American people; and with our great wealth, great as the cost is, I will not put it for a minute by the degradation that has come to American manhood in the soldiers that we have sent to those islands. I will not attempt to measure it by the side of the degradation that has come to the whole American people by our contact there, by lessening their respect for those great, eternal truths that no Christian nation can for a moment forget or overlook. The worse evil that is befalling us is not the money we are paying out. That we can pay; that we can forget, great as it is and burdensome as it is; but the other will remain with us always, a debt never to be paid. There will be no redeemer for that.

Mr. President, is it worth it? What do we get? Is there a Senator in this Chamber who is happy over the condition there?

FROM THE PHILIPPINE POINT OF VIEW.

Is there one here who will say that he has no sympathy with the struggling Filipinos? Can anyone fail to sympathize with them when he sees death and destruction measured out to them and knows, as he must know, that those men believe at least that they are fighting for home and fireside, doing that which the whole world has declared to be a virtue of superior character.

I may not agree with them. I may not believe that the great American people mean to subjugate and destroy those people. I may not believe, and do not believe, that the American people desire their subjugation or the destruction of their liberties. But we have not succeeded in convincing the Filipino that that is not our attitude.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] tells us that those people must submit. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] in impassioned terms declared to us that the American Army would stay there until every Filipino acknowledged its supremacy. He might have added, I suppose, until he either acknowledged its supremacy or went to his grave.

Why are those men in arms against the United States? I could understand why Aguinaldo, an ambitious Asiatic, might take up arms against us, for he wanted power and he wanted the advantage that he could secure as the leader of the people. But what of the rank and file? What do the common Filipinos mean when they stand in battle before us and when they are ready to go to their deaths in the strife? Do they not mean that they are standing in defense of what they believe to be right?

As an American I can not feel happy over the defeat of, and I can not myself wish that there should come disaster to, American arms. But I can not but respect the people who believe that we are attempting to subject them and put upon them a government and a system of civilization that they dislike. I can not help feeling for them, and I believe every man here feels for them. He may say they are misguided, that they are ignorant; but after all the man who, when he thinks his home is assailed, stands in front of it with his gun is a model of excellency the world over.

The American people came to their existence as a nation through blood. We had a long and bloody war—seven years of contest with the then ruling power of the world—but it was not longer than the war in the Philippine Islands will be. A Senator has said to me that there is no counterpart between our condition and that of these people. That is right; there is not. We were Englishmen. We had come from England and settled here under English charters and English law, but when England attempted to put upon us a tax that we believed she should not we went to war. We did not take up arms because of any atrocities committed upon us. We did not go to war because we were suffering from anything that Parliament had done. We fought for a principle. As Webster said, in the Senate, in 1834, we went to war against a preamble. We went to war against a parliamentary declaration that England had a right to govern us and provide for taxation of the American colonies without their consent. When Parliament passed a resolution declaring that the right existed to enact all the legislation required for the colonies, Mr. Wilkes, a member of the House of Commons, said, referring to it, "It is the compendium of slavery," and when Lord North said, "The tax is trifling," Englishmen in both Houses responded, "The American people are not fighting because of the size of the tax."

They were fighting because of the violation of the principle that taxation and representation under English law must go together. Oh, no; the conditions are not the same, but we had the right to fight. If we were justified in resisting, so is the Filipino.

It was demonstrated here by the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], as it has been demonstrated before, that when we went there the Filipino had for years been making a contest in those islands for independence from Spanish rule, and that he had every reason to believe that we were to give him a better condition than that which Spain had maintained.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE WAR.

Mr. President, I am not going into the question whether or not we promised the Filipinos independence. I am not going to touch that subject. It does not make any difference whether we promised it to them specifically or not. We had for one hundred and twenty-five years declared that people situated as they were situated had a right to govern themselves, and they had no reason to suppose that we had changed our attitude on that subject. They had a right to believe—as you and I believe and everybody here believes—that with a temporary domination that would come in those islands there would come a condition consistent with our declaration made during the last one hundred and twenty-five years by every act of ours and by ten thousand individual declarations that went out to the world as the cardinal principles of the American people.

When they found that we were adding to our Army, and when they found we were not making any promises or pledges to them, that we were not doing for them what we did for Cuba, that their demand that the same provision should be applied to them as to Cuba met with no response from the dominant party here, it is not surprising that they should have thought there was a necessity for the maintenance of their army. It is not astonishing that the friction of two armies of different peoples should have brought about a collision such as there was brought about on the 4th of February, 1899.

It is not a question whether they were to blame or we. In my view of the case, if they were to blame, if it is admitted they brought on the war, still it was our duty to have said to them, not by General Otis who was there, but for the American nation to have said to them by the legislative body, by the Executive of the United States, in an official manner, "There is to be no subjugation here."

Do you not believe that if we had asserted the principle which is set forth in the amendment I offered yesterday there would have been peace in those islands? Why could we not have done so? Did not our interests and our duty alike demand that course? If not, I pray some Senator here to enlighten me on that subject, either now or at some future time. I am sure I have as much interest in the success of the American people as any man who sits on the other side of the Chamber. I believe I have as much appreciation of the country's glory and greatness as anybody else in the Senate, and I can not myself see where there would have been any lowering of dignity if the American nation had said to those people, "You are making a mistake as to our intentions." The Senators who sit on the other side of the Chamber had control of the legislative and executive departments. Why did they not say to those people: "We do not intend to subjugate you."

You would have said it over and over again when you were appealing to us, who are not in accord with you on general subjects, to vote for the ratification of the treaty. You could not have ratified the treaty if you had declared your present policy to be the policy to be pursued under it. You lacked but a vote or two of being defeated. You would have lacked a dozen. You would have received no votes except from those who surrendered their judgment to the party caucus if you had told the truth when the treaty was before us, if you knew the truth. I do not charge now that any Senator here meant to misrepresent. I believe that the policy then was the policy enunciated in the fourth resolution with reference to Cuba up to a time after the treaty was ratified. And then, Mr. President, in some way—I do not know how—some evil influence became dominant and took control of the executive department of the Government, and the President's voice was no longer for peace, but for war.

No, Mr. President, there is not any counterpart of our relation to England at the time of the Revolution in the relation of the Philippines to the United States now. We were an intelligent people, but we knew what would happen to us if we remained under English rule.

Not degradation, not despoiling of property, not enslavement in the sense the term is used, but political enslavement was what our forefathers feared. We would have had to submit to a Parliament where we had no representative, which said to us, "You shall pay a tax of 3 pence or 2 pence a pound upon tea. You shall put a stamp upon everything that you buy and everything that you sell; every document that you issue you shall put a stamp on." That is taxation. What we said was that taxation without representation is tyranny.

Is it any less tyranny in the Philippine Islands than it was in America? I do not believe that we did intend, as a nation, to subjugate and destroy those people. And yet we apparently thought it was not necessary to make any effort to convince them that that was not the case. As a result of this negligence we have the war, flagrant war (if the reports are true, with probably 20,000 American citizens sacrificed) and the other evils of which I have spoken. Are these to last forever? After all, we are not ready, the great American people are not ready, after three years to say through the legislative department what the policy is to be; and yet you wonder that the ignorant Filipinos, men not acquainted with us, doubt whether we are to give them freedom or not. What reason have they to suppose that we are going to give them freedom? If we do not mean to hold them in our strong grip, in the grip of the greatest power in the world, which they realize as well as we, why can you not say to them that they are mistaken?

Has not the Administration had time to develop a policy? Is it possible that there are not statesmen enough in the Republican organization or in public life to determine what justice to the Filipino, what justice to the American people, what the interest of the Filipino and the interest of our own people demand? Must we go along in this unhappy condition? Do you think you answer the appeal of the Filipino when you reply to him, "You must submit; we will subjugate you. When you have laid down your arms, when you have surrendered yourself and are incompetent of further contest, then we will tell you what we are going to do with you?" The declaration was made here the other day that there is one thing we will promise. It was not said that we will promise peace, not that we will promise good government, but that we will promise the Filipino that the god of war shall be felt in every section of his land unless he submits unconditionally to us.

THE ENGLISH PRECEDENT.

Mr. President, I have spent some time in the last few months reading up the history of the conflict between Great Britain and this country. I have taken up the debates, and I found again and again accounts of men rising in the House of Lords and in the Commons and saying to their fellows, "Would you, could you deal with rebels with arms in their hands? No, no; there must be unconditional surrender. When the American people surrender then we will tell them what we are going to do." Pages of their reports are taken up with that kind of declaration.

But there were men there, liberty-loving Englishmen, who dared to stand up and say that they would not if they were in the place of the Americans surrender under that demand. It was not pleasing to the party in power in England, but no man rose in Parliament in the whole history of the war and charged any other man with treason when he said as Pitt said, "I admire and I love the Americans for the resistance they are making."

I wish to read an extract or two from speeches that used to stir our blood. I want to read what used to be in the old English reader when I was a boy, which we have all read with unction and delight, and which had a tendency to stimulate American youth with love of freedom, which had much to do with implanting in us the sentiment that the greatest glory in American life is the love of liberty and justice and the belief that when that departs from us the glory of America will be gone and the end of the Republic will come.

To go back somewhat to the time before we got into trouble with Great Britain, you will recall that Great Britain had had continental wars and had been in trouble with the rest of the world. When she was in her greatest possible distress there came forward an Englishman who brought order out of confusion, who stimulated the people of that country as no other man ever stimulated them or. in my opinion, the people of any other country in the world. That Englishman was none other than the Earl of Chatham, the great Pitt, and he had undoubtedly greater influence upon English character than any other man who ever lived. In his old age, full of honors and glory, tottering in his walk as an aged man does, he made his way to the House of Lords to defend the Americans, though not to defend American independence, for he said: "I am not for American independence; I do not like the way you are driving these people to independence." Then he added: "I wanted the dependency of the American people upon the Crown, but I want it as an Englishman; I want it as I have it in the county in which I live, and as we have it in every English shire and in every county."

Mr. President, if those words should be uttered here now, if Pitt were here and could speak here as he spoke there, he would be charged with sedition and treason on the floor of this Senate. Hear him further:

As to conquest, therefore, my lords, I repeat it is impossible. You may swell every expense and every effort still more extravagantly, pile and accumulate every assistance you can buy or borrow, traffic and barter with every little pitiful German prince that sells and sends his subjects to the shambles of a foreign prince, your efforts are forever vain and impotent, doubly so from this mercenary aid on which you rely, for it irritates to an incurable resentment the minds of your enemies to overrun them with the mercenary sons of rapine and plunder, devoting them and their possessions to the rapacity of hireling cruelty.

There is probably not a Senator here who has not, when a boy, declaimed these very words in the schoolhouses of the country:

If I were an American as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country, I would never lay down my arms. Never! Never! Never!

Not long since, in the city of Paris, there was a gathering of distinguished men, and at that gathering, among others, was the English minister, Mr. Monson, a scholarly gentleman—a man holding high rank aside from his position as an ambassador—who paid a high tribute to Pitt. The occasion was the American University Dinner Club, at Paris, February 22, 1897. If Pitt's position was contested then, as it was by some of the English lords who did not agree with him, the English sentiment to-day appears to be with him. This now is from the speech of the English ambassador:

It is unnecessary for me to remind you that even at the outset of the struggle, and for some time after its commencement, there were not wanting in the mother country voices and those the most eloquent, which not only denounced the policy of the King's Government, but proclaimed with conviction the impossibility of the task proposed. You must all of you remember the brilliant oration in which the great Chatham pointed out to his colleagues in the House of Lords the absolute futility of the enterprise.

"My lords," said he, "you can not conquer America."

And then Mr. Monson read the same extract from Pitt's speech that I have just read to you. When he concluded the quotation there was loud applause, and then he said—and this is what I particularly want to read:

This was the voice, these were the sentiments, of the most enlightened of the scions of the mother country. They failed in arresting the policy against which they were directed, and in my judgment they happily failed; but, none the less, they remain on record as the generous expression of a sympathy which the adherents of the court might qualify as treasonable, but which was in harmony with the traditions of England and with the principles by which she has achieved her constitutional liberties.

Mr. President, it was not necessary to wait until the days of Mr. Monson for a vindication of Pitt and his associates. It came many years before. It came when Lord Brougham, a great Englishman, said that George Washington was the greatest man of all the ages and that the principles for which he fought were the dearest of all to free men.

I read still further from Mr. Monson's remarks, as follows:

If Washington was the personification of sincere and modest patriotism, surely Chatham embodies in his mighty soul the inspirations of a patriotism none the less sincere nor less genuine, because it found an inadequate response on the part of those who encouraged a kind-hearted monarch in a course which exposed him to the charge of tyranny.

Preeminent on the east and west of the Atlantic stand up the figures of those two patriots; the one, the type of the calm, reflecting soldier, penetrated with the justice of his cause, and prepared to make every sacrifice on its behalf; the other, the sagacious statesman, ripe in years, experience, and foresight, brimful of sympathy with the cause of liberty, and overflowing with a true appreciation of the spirit which had been aroused by England's disregard of her best traditions.

Mr. HOAR. What is the Senator reading there?

Mr. TELLER. I stated that I was reading from the speech of the British ambassador to France, made February 22, 1897, in the city of Paris, at an American dinner. I read it to show that it is not inconsistent with loyalty to my Government, nor love and admiration for it, to protest against what I believe to be a great wrong, not only to the people of the Philippine Islands, but a great wrong to the American people.

Mr. President, let me read a word or two more from what Mr. Pitt said apropos of our rebellion against the exactions of the mother country:

The independent views of America have been stated and asserted as the foundation of this address. My lords, no man wishes for the due dependence of America on this country more than I do. To preserve it, and not confirm that state of independence into which your measures hitherto have driven them, is the object which we ought to unite in attaining. The Americans, contending for their rights against the arbitrary exactions, I love and admire; it is the struggle of free and virtuous patriots; but contending for independence and total disconnection from England, as an Englishman, I can not wish them success; for in a due constitutional dependency, including the ancient supremacy of this country in regulating their commerce and navigation, consists the mutual happiness and prosperity both of England and America.

In the same address he said further:

You can not conciliate America by your present measures; you can not subdue her by your present or by any measures. What, then, can you do? You can not conquer, you can not gain, but you can address; you can lull the fears and anxieties of the moment into an ignorance of the danger that should produce them. But, my lords, the time demands the language of truth. We must not now apply the flattering unction of servile compliance or blind complaisance. In a just and necessary war to maintain the rights or honor of my country I would strip the shirt from my back to support it. But in such a war as this, unjust in its principle, impracticable in its means, and ruinous in its consequences, I would not contribute a single effort nor a single shilling.

A few days later, while this old statesman was standing on the brink of the grave, for the volume which contains these speeches of his also contains the addresses that were made in Parliament on his death, he spoke again on the subject of the American Revolution. Parliament was considering the use of the Indians. They were disclaiming against such warfare and saying that Great Britain had degraded herself by using these savages, as we are degrading ourselves by using the Macabebes, and one of the lords said:

It was perfectly justifiable to use all the means that God and nature put into our hands.

Upon this, Mr. Pitt (the Earl of Chatham) again rose and said:

I am astonished, shocked, to hear such principles confessed, to hear them avowed in this House or in this country; principles equally unconstitutional, inhuman, and unchristian.

My lords, I did not intend to have encroached again upon your attention, but I can not repress my indignation, I feel myself impelled by every duty. My lords, we are called upon as members of this House, as men, as Christian men, to protest against such notions standing near the Throne, polluting the ear of majesty. "That God and nature put into our hands." I know not what ideas that lord may entertain of God and nature, but I know that such abominable principles are equally abhorent to religion and humanity. What! to attribute the sacred sanction of God and nature to the massacres of the Indian scalping knife, to the cannibal savage, torturing, murdering, roasting, and eating; literally, my lords, eating the mangled victims of his barbarous battles. Such horrible notions shock every precept of religion, divine or natural, and every generous feeling of humanity. And, my lords, they shock every sentiment of honor, they shock me as a lover of honorable war and a detester of murderous barbarity."

He then goes on to say that, old and infirm as he is, he could not refrain from entering his indignant protest.

Mr. President, the other day, when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] exclaimed with so much force and enthusiasm that we would continue this war until every man laid down his arms and surrendered to us, I could not help thinking that on several occasions the British King in his address to Parliament insisted in, if not quite the language, the same spirit, that he would continue the war upon the Americans until they should acknowledge the right of Great Britain to tax without representation and their proper dependence on the British Parliament.

I turn now for a moment to read, not the whole of the speech, but a few words from the utterances of the King, George III:

My Lords and gentlemen, I will steadily pursue the measures in which we are engaged for the reestablishment of that constitutional subordination which, with the blessing of God, I will maintain through the several parts of my dominions.

He then goes on at considerable length to speak of the American people as rebels, as lacking in gratitude for all that Great Britain had done for them in so many years.

OUR POSITION CRITICAL.

Mr. President, every man who has stood in the Senate for the last two years and found fault with the present condition in the Philippine Islands has done so at the risk of exciting the displeasure of the party in power. I do not care to what political organization he belongs, I do not care what public service he may have rendered, either to his State or the nation, if he calls attention to the wicked and infamous condition that exists in those islands and expresses the belief that there is a better way, he is held up to the contempt of the whole American people, and if he stands on this side of the Chamber he is charged with an attempt to introduce politics into the discussion of these questions.

Now, sir, if I know myself, I desire to make no political capital out of American misfortunes. I want to make no capital out of a condition that makes me sick at heart and sometimes makes me almost hopeless for the future of this great Government of ours.

I believe, Mr. President, as I stand here before the American Senate and the American people, that this is a critical period in American history. The legislation that we are to enact here will not only have its influence upon the 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 Filipinos, but the result will be felt by the 76,000,000 Americans. If persisted in, this course will absolutely change the character of the American Government. You can not continue a war for subjugation; you can not continue to insist that 10,000,000 men are to be encumbered with all the burdens of a relation to the United States, but to have none of its benefits, as is the case when you deny to them the constitutional rights that you give to everybody else; and the American people can not continue to submit, as they do submit now, to allow those things to go on, without a protest, without experiencing the degradation of the public morals which is rapidly approaching and is the inevitable result of injustice perpetrated by national authority.

Why, sir, you can maintain a republic only upon the intelligence and morality of the people. No republic has ever been upheld upon any other basis, and upon no other basis can one be upheld. Whenever we shall lose respect for the rights of men; whenever we shall see the American flag become the emblem, not of justice and right, but of force only, you will see a rapid decay of political morality and of the love of freedom. You may have a Republic in name. The Republic may not die in name; it may live; but it will not be the Republic of the fathers; it will not be the Republic that it was intended to be; it will not be the Republic of our youth. We may have great wealth, we may have great learning, and we may make high-sounding speeches about liberty and freedom and republican government, and yet not have a Republic at all.

Do not the readers of history remember that Augustus and others of the Cæsars were supposed to be living in a republic? No man was more fond, I believe, of parading his devotion to the republic than Augustus Cæsar himself, and yet a more absolute lord and master never existed on the face of the earth. That was a period of letters, of enlightenment, of art, of science, and of philosophy, and they maintained for years a pretense that they had a republican government, with an absolutely autocratic ruler.

There have been other republics besides ours, and they have lived longer than this Republic has lived, but there is no certainty because we have lived one hundred and twenty-five years that we will live always. We will live always, Mr. President, if we keep in mind all the time that justice must be done by every man to every other man, and, above all, that as a nation we must deal equitably with every power that we come in touch with.

THE UNITED STATES AS A WORLD POWER.

We are a great world power, Mr. President; the greatest in the world, I hear the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who sits in front of me, say. I agree with him. In all history there has not been such a nation as this. We have not suddenly sprung into a world power. When more than two generations ago—yes, nearly three generations ago, eighty years ago—we said to the world, "Thus far may you go and no farther; you shall not touch the struggling Republics of South America," they respected that declaration, and they have respected it ever since. I said before that, in my judgment, we had had the greatest influence upon the affairs of mankind of any people, at least in modern times; and we have had that influence to our glory, not as a great world power, but as lovers of men and lovers of justice.

THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION AND ITS WORK.

We have in the Philippine Islands 6,000,000 Christian men. They are not heathens. They may not be up to our standard; they may not have learned the liturgy of freedom as we have learned it; their anthems may not be sung to the same tune as ours in their celebration of liberty and freedom, but according to their capacity they are as liberty loving as we are. Their conceptions are not so high, but their conceptions are their own, given to them by the Almighty, and they have a right to them, and we have no right to say that ours are better. There are 6,000,000 of Christian people that we are attempting to deprive of the right of self-government. I know it will be said in reply, "That is not true." When do you propose to give them self-government? I asked that question of the Senator from Wisconsin a year ago; I asked him what was to be our policy. He then told me, as he told the Senate, that we would have to send a commission out there to find out the facts in order to determine what should be our policy. We have sent a Commission there, not to find out the facts—although that may be one of their duties—but we have sent them there, as we have been told again and again, to supply an example to those people of what constitutes American government.

Yet in the face of this declaration you have in the statutes enacted for that archipelago by the Philippine Commission something which shows the conception of that Commission of what an American government ought to be, and if any Filipino can fall in love with that he ought to be a slave for the balance of his life.

Who have been the tyrants of the world? Those who exercised power without right. It does not make any difference what you call them, they who assume power—and all power is assumed which does not come from the people over whom it is to be exercised—are tyrants.

I do not intend to spend very much time over that so-called law which was read to us here last week, but I want to allude to it briefly.

For more than twenty-two years I have had a seat in this Senate. I believe I have been as careful in my attendance as most Senators. I came into the Senate a comparatively short time after the close of the great civil war. We had then to deal with a great many ugly questions growing out of that war, and I have been a witness of some very strange occurrences in this body, things that would not be tolerated now, but which were, perhaps, justifiable, or respectable, I may say, after that great war. But I never saw anything that struck me as so remarkable as the so-called enactments of the Philippine Commission which were read the other day in the hearing of the Senate. I had seen accounts of some of those enactments in the public press, but I had assumed, for the credit of the Commission, that they were not truly stated. I can not help expressing the gratification that came to me when a Senator on this floor declared that the president of that Commission did not approve of those enactments.

I had respected that official for many years as a man of learning, of character, and as a prominent citizen of the United States. I had known his father; I had known something of his family; and when it was stated here that he had not approved of those enactments my heart took courage. But when a few days later I learned that he, like the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], had given his adhesion to those enactments as proper enactments my heart sank within me. I do not know whether the American Senate, controlled now by the Republican party, is going to stand for those enactments or not; I do not know whether the Senators can satisfy their consciences or the American people by the violation of the fundamental principles of free government by saying, as the French say—I shall not give it in French for fear that I might not get the proper pronunciation—"that is war."

When trouble occurred in France, and when outrages of a gross character were committed, the Frenchmen said, as an excuse, "That is war." Mr. President, you can not say that is war, for I assert here now that the history of mankind does not furnish a parallel for the infamy of these enactments. Wilkes said the declaration that Parliament had a right to enact all the laws for America was the compendium of tyranny. So I say of this, Mr. President, it is the compendium of tyranny, it is the compendium of infamy; and yet I have seen men stand up on this floor and say that they believed it was necessary. If it is necessary that we should violate constitutional principles, if it is necessary that we should outrage all the traditions of liberty-loving people for ages, it is not worth while that we should attempt to hold those islands a single minute. No obligation can be great enough upon us to require such a sacrifice of conscience and of decency as we should make if we give our adhesion to that idea.

I want to see if there are any more Senators sitting on the other side of the Chamber who will stand up and say, "We believe that is a just and a righteous act." Let me read it, Mr. President. I notice the Senator from Ohio skipped it. I know that at heart he did not believe in it; at least, I can not believe that he did.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to ask what it is that he says I skipped in the reading of the statutes?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, you read it.

Mr. FORAKER. Then why does the Senator say that I skipped it?

Mr. SPOONER. You skipped denouncing it.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator read it, but without making any comments on it, I mean.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will allow me to say that there is not anything in that statute that I am not content to read and indorse and comment upon.

Mr. TELLER. Well, Mr. President, to my surprise the Senator said that several days ago, but he said it in the heat of debate. Having great respect for the Senator, I attributed the utterance in great part to the fact that it was said in the heat of debate. If he says now, after deliberation and thought, that he approves of the statute, it is not for me to criticise him; I leave him to the ages; I leave him to the people who shall come after him; I leave him to the liberty-loving people and the law-abiding people of the country. If he can say in his heart, after deliberation, that the statute that I shall read in a few minutes is a proper one to pass, no matter what the exigencies may be, I leave him to settle that, not with me, but with the American people, with the people, as I have said before, who have liberty-loving ideas.

The Senator read with a good deal of interest the other day several statutes of the Philippine Commission which comport exactly with our statutes. The Senator can not see any difference between the statutes passed by the Philippine Commission and our statutes. Why, sir, the difference between conditions is everything in a statute. We provide that if a man learns that treason is contemplated or has been committed he must make the fact known. If by the infirmities of human nature, by his love for somebody, or by his fears, or from the fact that he sympathizes with treason, he does not see fit to make it known, what shall happen to him? He is to be tried by a jury of his peers; he is to have his neighbors called and they are to listen to the testimony; they are to consider it; they are to adjudicate upon it. The Filipino is to be tried, Mr. President, by no jury. He is to be tried by an American judge, in most cases, and when he is not tried by an American judge he is to be tried by what would have been called in Revolutionary days a Tory Filipino. He is to be tried by a man who for a stipend that is paid him goes onto the bench to do the work of the conqueror of his people, who withholds from him, as from all, any promise of a better time in the immediate future or any other future, except the indefinite promise that "when you are fit for self-government we will give it to you."

Mr. President, let me read this statute. I want to read first the eighth section, which provides that—

> Every person who shall utter seditious words or speeches, write, publish, or circulate scurrilous libels against the Government of the United States or the insular government of the Philippine Islands, or which tend to disturb or obstruct any lawful officer in executing his office, or which tend to instigate others to cabal or meet together for unlawful purposes, or which suggest or incite rebellious conspiracies or riots, or which tend to stir up the people against the lawful authorities or to disturb the peace of the community, the safety and order of the Government, or who shall knowingly conceal such evil practices, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RAWLINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to inform the Senator that that section is copied almost verbatim from the statute of Tennessee on the subject of treason and sedition. I have the Tennessee statute before me, and will read it, with the Senator's permission.

Mr. TELLER. I will take the Senator's word for it. He need not read the statute.

Mr. BATE. May I ask the Senator from Ohio what is the date of that statute?

Mr. FORAKER. That is the Tennessee statute. I do not know the date; it is not given here. But it is followed by a note in this compilation to the effect that—

> This section was probably drafted by Hon. Luke E. Wright, acting governor of the Philippines, who formerly practiced law in Tennessee. Being familiar with the statutes of that State, he naturally adopted the language employed by the Tennessee legislature in creating an enactment of similar character.

It is given here as section 5555 of the Code of Tennessee. I should like to read it.

Mr. TELLER. I would rather the Senator would not interrupt me by reading anything at all now. I will yield to him for anything that is proper, but I am not going to yield for a speech.

Mr. FORAKER. Inasmuch as the Senator read section 8 of the enactment of the Philippine Commission, I thought I should like to show that it was put in there by incorporation from the Tennessee statute.

Mr. TELLER. That is not the statute I referred to, nor a counterpart of it; but I will come to that.

Is it any answer to that to say that some other community may have passed a law that is cruel and harsh and opens to the courts a latitude of discretion to determine what is to disturb the public, to determine what incites rebellion? All these things are left not to a jury to determine, but to a court. In Tennessee a jury of Tennesseans would say whether a man's act incited to rebellion or not, and he would be tried before a Tennessee judge; but it is not a Filipino judge who sits out there and who would determine such a case. If he is a Filipino, he has American money in his pocket and wants to keep his place, and we know that in the days of our Revolution there were no people so harsh upon our liberty-loving soldiers and the people who stood for freedom and independence as were the tories. It will not do for the Senator to think he has answered that question by saying Tennessee did it or Ohio did it or that any other State did it. Conditions are different.

DO THE FILIPINOS WANT US?

We are over there, Mr. President, acting professedly in the interest of the Filipinos, and you on the other side of the Chamber are telling us that the Philippine people want us there; that the great majority of the people want us there; and yet you justify such enactments by saying a condition exists there which makes it necessary. If the people want you there, you do not need any such statutes as these, and if you do need them, it is self-evident that the people do not want you there. That I think I may say without offense to anybody. I believe we all know that as a matter of fact the Filipino people do not want us there, but the contrary is always the cry of power under such circumstances.

I could read from the debates in Parliament of the eighteenth century to show that such a plea was made in England during our Revolution. Member and lord, one after another, in both houses rose again and again, declaring that three-fourths of the American people wanted English rule; that it was the wicked American Congress that had got control of affairs and would not allow peace to be made on British terms. Not only that, Mr. President, but Parliament appointed a committee which took testimony, and a member of the first Continental Congress went before the committee and swore that three-fourths of the American people wanted to submit to British rule, but that the other fourth were so infamous that they would not allow them to do so. Speech after speech was made to the effect that the people of the colonies wanted British law and British authority. But notwithstanding these representations England sent over here a great army of 60,000 men to keep the minority in check. This is just the course we are pursuing toward the Philippines, except that we have had at one time 10,000 more men there than England sent to America.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly, for a question.

Mr. SPOONER. Did not the Senator vote to send the Army over there?

Mr. TELLER. I did not have anything to say about that.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator voted for the bill.

Mr. TELLER. What bill?

Mr. SPOONER. The bill increasing the Army.

Mr. TELLER. Do you mean originally?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. When we had to increase the Army, I voted for the increase, I presume.

Mr. SPOONER. It was to enable the President to send troops to the Philippines. The Senator voted for that act, I presume?

Mr. TELLER. I am going to say a word or two about that.

Mr. HOAR. I do not want to interrupt the Senator when he is answering another question——

Mr. TELLER. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. But I want, before he passes from that point, to call his attention to the remark he made about our sending 10,000 more troops to the Philippines than Great Britain sent here. As I understand, we have sent, including those we have there now and those who are under orders to go there, 120,000 men to the Philippines, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. TELLER. You are not mistaken.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator was understating it.

Mr. TELLER. I was recalling the fact that there were 71,000 American soldiers in the Philippine Islands at one time, whilst all that Great Britain ever sent here at all times was 66,000. Of course they were not all in the field at the same time. A part of the time some of them were in durance vile as prisoners of war.

Mr. HOAR. Taking all the troops we have sent to the Philippines and those now under orders, we have sent about twice the number that Great Britain sent here during the Revolutionary war.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; we have sent to the Philippines about 120,000 troops.

Mr. BATE. We have 40,000 there now, according to the Adjutant-General. We have had as many as 77,000 there, 62,000 of them regulars. They are all regulars who are there now.

Mr. TELLER. It has been stated that we had 76,000 troops in the Philippines. I believe 71,000 was really the correct number. I want to leave this subject for a minute, but I shall come back to it. The Senator diverted me.

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon.

Mr. TELLER. Not at all. I am entirely willing that the Senator should have interrupted.

THE PEACE TREATY.

Mr. President, I am one of those who voted for the treaty with Spain. Before it got here I made up my mind that the best thing we could do was to ratify the treaty and get rid of Spain in the settlement of the question. Long before the treaty came here I made a speech in the Senate, in which I announced myself for the treaty, as I understood it to be, and I should probably have been for the treaty if it had contained other provisions, because I was anxious to close up the war between the United States and Spain. Until the treaty was ratified there was technically a state of war. We had some troops over in the Philippines; we had some troops in Cuba; we had a large number of troops ready to go from here, if there was a necessity for it, either to Cuba, the Philippine Islands, or anywhere else, if Spain should attempt to continue the contest. One object in ratifying the treaty was to reduce the Army.

On the 20th of December, 1898, I announced, in the most unequivocal terms that my language would permit, that I did not want to hold the Philippine Islands; that I did not want to make them a part of the United States. As I say, the treaty had not been received here when I announced in unmistakable terms the doctrine that had been promulgated in the Senate by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] who sits before me. Every idea that he then enunciated I agreed to and had proclaimed on the floor of the Senate. I believed then, and I believe now, that the best thing that could have been done would have been to ratifiy that treaty "instanter." We ratified it on the 6th day of February, and it required every vote that could be gotten to secure its approval. Yes, we ratified it, but accompanying the ratification was the declaration of every leading Republican in this Chamber and every leading Republican in public life that the charges which had been made on this side of the Chamber and on the other side—that we were to keep those people against their will and hold the islands—were not true. The Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] yesterday read the record on this subject of a few. He might have read the record of twice as many. Every man was committed to this one proposition: That when the treaty should be ratified we, the American Congress, would determine what should be the attitude of the American people toward those people over there.

We did not then have access to the files of the Department of War. On the 21st day of December, 1898, the President of the United States sent a proclamation to the Philippines. I do not hesitate to say here that if that proclamation had been read to the American Senate not a solitary vote would have been secured on this side of the Chamber for the ratification of the treaty, because it enunciated a policy in absolute contradiction to that which was proclaimed here on this floor both in executive and in open session as to what should be the policy of the American people touching the islands. Those instructions of the President went to the Philippine Islands, and when they reached General Otis he censored and cut out the objectionable matters contained in them, because he said if they were published they would bring on war. And yet, Mr. President, one proclamation from Otis and another from General Miller went to the Filipino people long before we heard of or had any knowledge of them, and the Filipino people said: "Otis is lying to us and Miller is telling us the truth."

Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt that this duplicity did more to hasten the contest than anything and all other things done. I can imagine its effect upon a people, not savages, but, as stated here, a people many of whom are educated, a people who had been in contest with Spain, a large percentage of whom are the equals in intelligence and learning of the people of almost any nation in the world, a people who, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] tells us, had 800 students in the University of Manila and thousands of students in the European universities when the trouble began. Is it strange that such a people should have suspected our honesty? Not at all.

BEGINNING OUR WAR IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Moreover, we did not know when we voted for this army that the commander of the Filipino army had said to our general in charge: "This is a mistake, and if you want a cessation of hostilities we will have it." I know the report that that statement was made has been denied, but no man can read the statement of General Otis first and last and not believe that it is true as I repeat it, that we might have had a cessation of hostilities. The statement is further to the effect that the Filipinos were then on the defensive, not on the aggressive, and that we were the aggressive party during that first battle.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado if the original order of General Otis, directing him to proceed to enforce submission, was not itself an act of war under the law of nations?

Mr. TELLER. I am somewhat diffident as to my knowledge of the laws of nations as they are now being construed. I do not know what they are under present conditions, but I should say that formerly, ten years ago, it would have been a declaration of war.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose any nation on the face of the earth had issued to its military commander an order to subdue another people; is there any people on the face of the earth who would not treat that as an act of war?

I put that question because of what seemed to me the very unimportant discussion as to whether the Filipinos fired first on that night when the first shots were fired, or we did. There had been, as I conceive, a formal and unquestionable act of war on our part long before.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is right as to the question of law, and coming as it did with two interpretations of it, it is not strange that the Filipinos did not lay down their arms, nor is it strange that the conflict arose.

The best peacemaker in the world is not a soldier; the best person to maintain the peace is not a soldier, and some of us realized the danger there was of a conflict with those people during the whole time.

THE SEDITION LAWS OF THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. President, I am coming back to this legislation, so called. I deny that it is entitled to be dignified by the name of legislation, but it is the law under which the Filipino must live. It is the law under which he must act. I read one section, to which the Senator from Ohio thinks he has answered all objections by saying that Tennessee has a statute like it. He might have gone to Russia, but if he had done so I do not think he could find one quite like the one I am going to read. We once had a sedition law here, but if anybody will get it and read it—I read it the other day—he will find that it is as mild as a dove, and this is a roaring lion compared to it. Now let me read:

> All persons who shall meet together for the purpose of forming or who shall form any secret society, or who shall after the passage of this act continue membership in a society already formed, having for its object, in whole or in part, the promotion of treason, rebellion, or sedition, or the promulgation of any political opinion or policy, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Is there a Senator who will say that Congress, with all its power, could pass such a law as this? I should like to have some Senator who thinks it can be done to answer this question now. If he wants to reply he can have an hour out of my time to do so. Is there anybody, who knows what is the power of Parliament, who would say here that the English Parliament could pass such a law and have it held valid by the courts of Great Britain? I do not believe any Senator here will put himself on record as saying that that is a valid law.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it not a fact that the substitute reported by the minority of the committee recommends the continuance of that law?

Mr. TELLER. No; it does not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I so understand it.

Mr. TELLER. But if it did, I am not bound by that.

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I do not believe the Senator is——

Mr. TELLER. I stated yesterday that I was not bound by anybody's opinion in this matter but my own. But the minority refer to and say "the laws." Does that expression mean simply "a law?" If it does, I do not understand what "laws" are. That could not be a law if it had behind it the entire body of Congress, every man voting for it, and the President signing it. Why? Because it is contrary to the great Bill of Rights; because it is contrary to the Declaration of Independence; because it is contrary to the Constitution of the United States; because it is contrary to every principle of justice and humanity. It is an invasion of the rights of mankind, and I repeat that, if your condition over there is so deplorable that you must justify it by saying that it is a proper thing to do, God have mercy on the people of those islands, and God have mercy on the man who stands before the American people and says it is a just and righteous law. I repeat, it is the compendium of tyranny. Yes; it is the compendium of infamy, and I shall not bring myself within the criticism of any Senator here who has a liberty-loving heart when I repeat that assertion. It can not be said too often.

Mr. President, a thousand islands like those of the Philippines are not worth such a degradation of the so-called legal department of the Government as is involved in that so-called law, not if they were all that is pictured by the fancy of those who forget that we owe something to mankind and that we owe something to those people—and certainly we do owe something to them if our flag rightfully floats over them. What we owe them is protection in the enjoyment of everything that we have for our own benefit.

Now, will you stand before the world and say an American needs more protection than the Filipino, that the law is a violation of an American's rights but not a violation of the Filipino's, and yet talk to him and talk to us about the benefits you are conferring upon him by putting him under the flag of our country?

Before I get through I intend to call attention to the condition over there, and I believe it to be damnable. I believe it to be a disgrace to us. I believe it is unnecessary on any line of conduct that we are justified in pursuing; yet I do not believe it is so bad as it must be if that act can be justified as an act of war.

PHILIPPINE STATUTE COMPARED WITH TREASON LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Following the section of the law I have read there are several other sections on the same line, and it is possible that the Senator from Ohio in his researches may find that some other people, forgetful of the great principles of human rights, have enacted some law like each of them. But I challenge him now, and I challenge every man here, to find anywhere in the annals of human history an enactment like that in its entirety. The hordes of Asia that invaded Europe with their Mohammedan teachings, with their declaration that they would impose on the people a better religious belief than they had, never when they trampled out the government where they went descended to such wickedness and cruelty as are found in that act. No man would be safe under it.

Mr. FORAKER. I understood the Senator from Colorado to challenge me to cite any legislation, in any country, State, or nation, similar to that upon which he has been commenting. I call his attention to the statutes of the State of Maryland, and if he will only compare the section from the Maryland statute on treason and sedition with the section upon which he has been commenting he will find that it is almost a literal transcript.

Mr. TELLER. There is a wide difference.

Mr. FORAKER. I contend that there is not. I can not now do more than to answer the challenge by making the citation.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator will have plenty of opportunity to answer the statement.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, I merely now point to the statute. I will say to the Senator that in due time I will undertake to satisfy everybody who will listen that there is no difference in point of principle, and only that difference in language which the different situation makes necessary.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator can not do that. It is not the fact. Suppose the provisions are similar. Under what condition was the Maryland statute enacted? When it became a law there was a great slave population in that State and it was applied to the slaves. Has the time come when in this Chamber legislation is to be directed and justified by the slavery legislation that preceded the late war?

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that he is mistaken; that it was enacted when the Union was threatened with overthrow. It was because there was a large disloyal population in the State of Maryland ready to go into insurrection, and it was enacted for precisely the same purpose that that statute has been enacted in the Philippines.

Mr. SPOONER. And it shows that on its face.

Mr. FORAKER. It shows it on its face.

Mr. TELLER. Those were times which were exceptional.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to add one word? I dislike to interrupt him, but I wish to call his attention in this connection, if he will bear with me, to the fact that I have gone pretty carefully through this statute, and I find that it is made up of United States Revised Statutes, different sections from different State statutes, and a continuance, in a modified form, of the Spanish code that was already in existence in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. TELLER. I have examined the Spanish code. The Senator can not find all of that statute in the Spanish code.

Mr. FORAKER. No; not all of it.

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. FORAKER. I say a part of it is taken from the Spanish code; but most of it, four-fifths of it, is taken from the laws of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. If it was taken from the laws of the United States, it was taken from those laws that are not enforced and never have been enforced. I wish the Senator would keep in mind, and I want everybody else to keep in mind, a wide distinction between that law in the Philippine Islands and a law where the jury system prevails and where every man has a right to appeal, not to a hostile court, but to a court of the vicinage in which he lives and to his neighbors as a trial jury.

Here the Filipino is to be tried by a hostile court, to be tried by a court that does not understand his language, or, if tried by a court which does understand, that has surrendered to the conqueror and has become the willing oppressor of the people of that country. When I say that the counterpart of the Philippine legislation can not be found, I mean that it can not be found under the circumstances; and they must be taken into consideration. Possibly in the excitement of our civil war some things may have been done that were not justifiable. But I repeat, as I said yesterday, that there was no attempt to execute a similar law to this during the civil war. I refer to the laws upon our statute book of which the Senator from Massachusetts particularly complained.

I venture to say that there was not a single case during our war of 1861–1865 in which the loving mother of a rebel soldier was compelled to give evidence of his disloyalty to anybody. What would have been the condition in Kentucky, what would have been the condition in some parts of Virginia, where families were divided, if such a law had been enforced? It was impossible that the American sentiment at any time could have justified this procedure—that when the disloyal soldier, coming back from the Confederate battlefield, and coming into the home where the mother was a loyal woman, and there were plenty of those cases, or where the father was a loyal man, that that father or that mother must take him and surrender him to the authorities or give notice of where he was and what he was doing. The attempt to carry out or to enforce such a law would have been resisted in the most determined manner by the entire Northern people. We recognized the belligerent rights of the South in the very beginning of the war. Europe recognized them. I say now that section 9 of that Philippine act is an invasion of the law of nations as to belligerent rights.

I said that this statute had no counterpart. I think I ought to change that statement. There is possibly one as wicked. When Maximilian was trying to force himself, by Austrian and French bayonets, upon a throne in our neighboring Republic of Mexico, and when he found the people apparently subdued to-day in the field to-morrow, he made an order which history says he stipulated with the officials when he made it should not be enforced. That was that every Mexican found with arms in his hands should be considered a pirate against the Government and be executed without trial. That order did much, I am told to arouse the people of Mexico; and when they, by force of arms, got possession of Maximilian and his assistants, the wife of a distinguished officer went to the President of Mexico, a man of great ability and of great worth, and pleaded with him on her bended knees for the life of Maximilian.

He said: "Madam, if all Mexico were on their knees before me, justice requires the execution of this man for that order." And he had him executed; and badly as the world felt to see the Emperor thus executed, for he was a chivalric man, mankind universally admitted that the act was within the laws of war and he deserved his fate, except for the palliating circumstance, not then known to the world, that he had protested that the act must not be enforced. But the decree was enforced, and the wicked men who enforced it went to their death at the same moment that he did. If the law has any counterpart, there it is.

According to this statute, the Filipino shall not advocate independence, neither in peace nor in war. The pulpit is closed. The rostrum is closed. The mouth of every Filipino is closed. If those who passed that enactment could have reached the thoughts and sentiments of the Filipinos, they would doubtless have made it a crime for them to aspire to liberty and independence. This act complained of is not the Maryland act in words or spirit.

Mr. President, there never has been a people struggling for liberty since I can remember that I have not at least felt my heart go out to them. I may think that the Filipinos are mistaken men and that they ought to submit to us and trust to our generosity, but they do not believe so. I would make it possible for them to believe that we are not robbers and murderers, disregarders of rights, but that we are still lovers of justice and liberty, not liberty and justice applied to ourselves alone, but of liberty and justice as applied to all men.

IS THERE COMMERCIAL ADVANTAGE IN HOLDING THE PHILIPPINES?

Now I desire to take up another phase of this case. I have taken more time than I ought to have consumed in this debate, but I have been led on by the magnitude of the subject. This is a question for the great American people to settle. It has not been settled. It is before us. We are to deal with it. We are to settle at this session of Congress what shall be our policy, what shall be the future relation of the Filipinos to our Government. I do not, therefore, make any apology. I should despise myself as unworthy of a seat on this floor if, entertaining the opinions I do, I did not stand here and protest.

Mr. President, I am not without hope. I know that some day, and I hope that day is not far distant, the American people will take hold of this subject, and I believe they will do justice as they see it. The great body of the American people are still true to these great principles, and they will see this matter as some of us think we see it. They will not be blinded by the declaration that there is money in this thing; that there is commercial advantage.

What is it that we are to get? I hope some Senator will be prepared to-morrow, or before we vote on this bill, to tell us where the commercial advantage comes. I repeat the statement with which I began, that the only advantage in holding these islands is that they may never be used to our disadvantage; that no strong power may ever get lodgment there. I repeat, and the history of the world will sustain me in the assertion, that the way to hold them is to hold them by the consent of the people of the islands, and in no other way can we hold them so that they will be of benefit. In any other way that you may hold them they will be a source of danger to us.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is the Senator from Colorado entirely certain that at the present time there is not a majority of the Christian people, as they are called, of the Philippine Islands who do consent to our government there?

Mr. TELLER. If I can believe a very distinguished officer of our Army who I insist has better opportunities of knowing than any civil commissioner, if I can trust the written letters that I have seen from men in high authority, written within the last sixty days, there is not a tithe of them who want us there. But if the Philippine people do want us, let them have an opportunity of speaking. Let them have the opportunity of saying so, not in front of your bayonets, not with your soldiers dominating them, but give them an opportunity to express their opinion without the fear of bayonet rule.

General MacArthur says that the efforts that we are making to bring these people into such relation with us as will entitle them to a government of their own means the entire reorganization of society. What an undertaking! What does that mean, Mr. President? It means a people, the most conservative on the face of the earth, attached by traditions to things that exist, are to change every sentiment in their minds and to adopt a civilization inconsistent with their ideas of right, because we think it beneficial to them that they should.

I have no question in my own mind but that not a small per cent, but practically no considerable number, of the people desire our presence in those islands. I know something of the Asiatic mind. I have come in contact with it more or less for the last forty years. I know that when the civil Commission goes out the natives will meet them with banners, and they will build arches and all that, but they would shoot the commissioners if they found them where they could safely do so. It is the Asiatic way; it is Asiatic dissimulation. I know that when the chairman of the Commission went around the islands the people attended, and there were huzzas. Does any man here believe that a people who had been fighting Spain and who have seen no other American government but autocracy have fallen in love with it and want it to dominate them? It is preposterous to suppose that that could be the case, and the evidence does not support the presumption, no matter what the chairman of the Commission may say.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. TELLER. You may.

Mr. HOAR. I ask him if he does not think that a belief on the part of our Commission there that that people, or a majority of them, favor our rule is not totally inconsistent with and negatived by the decree the Commission have lately promulgated, under which, if the Americans in Manila on the next Fourth of July undertake to celebrate the day by a simple reading of the Declaration of Independence, they are liable to be sent to the penitentiary?

Mr. TELLER. I introduced some things that bear on that point the other day. I will refer to the subject, though I had not intended to do so. I said that Senators on the other side of the Chamber would be afraid to read the Declaration of Independence. Of course I meant publicly. I suppose that occasionally some of them will read it in secret, and perhaps they will think of the time when their hearts did beat in sympathy with the principles declared in it, and they will wonder how they could have believed in such antiquated ideas as therein contained. But what I meant to say is that they would not stand up here and read the Declaration, because if the fact that they had done so was telegraphed out to Manila it would incite rebellion.

Mr. President, I do not know of any document—in all of my reading I have never seen anything that would excite a man more to stand for his rights than the Declaration of Independence.

A night or two after I had made my previous statement here a gentleman of high character, whom I have known for many years, after spending eighteen months in the islands, said to me that on a gala day there he was invited to make a speech, and the question came up as to what should be his subject. He said perhaps he would talk in line with our Declaration of Independence, when the committee on arrangements, an American committee, said to him that it was not safe to do that. I saw in the papers recently—I do not know whether the statement is truthful or not—that some assemblage where that document was read were regarded by the authorities as disloyal and seditious gatherings, because they were reading and commenting on the Declaration of Independence. That may be a newspaper story, but I can see very well——

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask a question? Did I understand the Senator to say that the Commission said to that gentleman that he could not make the speech?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no, I did not say so; I said the committee that was holding the meeting.

Mr. BURTON. I beg your pardon.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know what the Commission has said about those things. I should not, after reading that ninth section of their so-called act, think it possible for the Commission to allow anybody to read the American Declaration of Independence. If that act could be justified the Commission would be justified in saying that the Declaration of Independence could not be read.

I wish now to speak for a little while in reply to the Senator from Connecticut. Of course I shall not myself accept the statement made by the optimistic witnesses who come here and tell us that peace prevails when Army officers say it does not. I will trust the Army officer. He is there to keep peace. He is there to secure the subjugation of the Filipino and to compel him to admit that he is being governed as he ought to be governed by this Commission. He has a difficult task, but that is what he is there for and that is what he is attempting.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I asked the question that I did because I had been reading from the reports of the civil government of 23 provinces which were put into the testimony of Governor Taft. I do not wish to take the time now to quote from these reports, but when the Senator is through I should like to put them in the RECORD.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care what the Senator does with the reports when I get through. I am liberal about being interrupted. It is quite possible for the Senator from Connecticut to determine in an authoritative way whether there is a majority of the people out there who want our rule. You have the Administration. You have the purse. You have everything. You can send a commission there, as we were told a year ago you were going to do. You ought to send it. You ought to pick out a commission of the best men in the United States and send them there. That is a condescension which Great Britain made to us when we were at war with her. She sent two commissions over here to see if she could not compose the difficulty.

I said before that the Army is not a proper agent to do these things. Neither do I believe that the civil Commission is a proper agent. You ought to send a commission there, and, what is more, you ought to bring from the islands here, if there is a question about it, 200 or 300 of the people and let them tell their story here. A year ago I put into the RECORD the protest of 2,000 Filipinos from the city of Manila, not one of them raising his hand against the Government, not one of them ever having done so that I know of, in which they said in the most unequivocal terms, in the same terms and tones that Pitt used in speaking of the Americans, "You can not subdue and subjugate the Filipino people."

Since I made the statement as to the Declaration of Independence I have read a letter from an Army officer who is a man of some prominence, though not in command. This letter was written to another officer and was a private letter, not for the public, in which he depicted the conditions over there. There are plenty of such men who can be brought here to give their testimony. I know they will give it under the shadow of the domination of the War Department, and I know if they are Regular Army officers they will come here at the risk of their deserved and recognized rights of promotion, but they will come if called. If that is a charge against the War Department, Mr. President, you have only to look at the record of the War Department for two years past to find a justification of the charge. Yet, in the face of the probability of exciting departmental displeasure, you can get in the Philippine Islands men who will come here and tell the truth, and you can not say it is asking too much to ask that they be brought. What has this war cost in money, to say nothing of the cost in blood and manhood? It has cost probably not less than $350,000,000. It is to cost you twice that amount if the civil Commission tell the truth. It will cost you ten times that amount if Chaffee and MacArthur can be relied upon. And what are you to get?

Let me submit now, so that some one may reply, what it is that you get. A trade there which with all the world this year was worth $53,000,000, of which our share was $4,500,000, imports and exports, $1,000,000 less than it was last year. Yet we will hear that trade follows the flag? With Great Britain there was a trade of $17,000,000 as against our trade of $4,500,000, $2,000,000 of which was exports from the United States to Manila. And what do you suppose the major part of that was composed of? Of the $2,061,000 exports from the United States to Manila, $1,110,000 was in wine, beer, and whisky.

Mr. President, if the whole trade came to us, and if the profit of the whole $53,000,000 came to us, it would not pay the cost of this war for a single week, and if it was all profit it would not pay for the conduct of this war a single year.

Later I mean to touch upon what the condition is there more fully than I have done, but I do not care about going any further to-night, and in accordance with the universal custom of the Senate, believing as I do that there is no haste in this matter, that this is a question of such infinite importance, not to the Filipinos alone, but to us, I feel justified in asking the Senate to allow me to cease for the present and to continue to-morrow or at some subsequent time.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I did not desire to interrupt the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], because I think this matter of interruption in the Senate has been carried to a great length, and I desire always to refrain from interrupting a Senator in a way which will disturb the thread of his argument and the continuity of his speech.

But I did wish to call attention to the reports of the civil governors in the different provinces of the Philippine Islands. They are Filipinos; they are not Americans. They were appointed civil governors of the provinces in the islands by the Taft Commission, as I understand, and now in almost all of the provinces elections are going on among the people for civil governors who will take the places of the appointed governors.

Before I call attention to their reports, I want to say that it is a very strange thing, Mr. President, if there is no peace and no prospect of peace in those islands, that our army has been reduced there from 70,000 men to less than 40,000 men. It is not true that we have an army of 70,000 men there, as has been so repeatedly said here. We did have an army of 70,000 men there.

Mr. TELLER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. I certainly did not say that we have an army of 70,000 men there.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; the Senator did not say so, but it has been said repeatedly.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that we have an army of 40,000 there.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We have an army of a little less than 40,000 American troops, and there are some three or four thousand, more or less, who belong to a provincial army, so to speak, which was authorized at the last session of Congress. But I am told—I did not hear it myself—that Governor Taft in his testimony before the committee said—I think on the last occasion when he was before the committee—that arrangements had already been made for the recall of 10,000 of the troops now there, so that in the near future there would be only 30,000 American troops in in the Philippines.

Now, it seems to me very strange, Mr. President, that if these people are struggling against subjugation, for the establishment of liberty, which we are trying to deprive them of, there is at the same time a condition of things which enables us to reduce our army in the Philippines from 70,000 to 30,000 men.

I think if we take facts and not fancies, if we take things as they really are and not as they are conjured up by the party of protest and disapproval, we shall see that we are getting along very well in the Philippine Islands, and are progressing very rapidly toward a condition there in which, under the sovereignty of the United States, a government will be established in which the Filipinos themselves will have a very large share of participation and which will be entirely satisfactory to them, and which they will welcome as a blessing to themselves and the archipelago.

Now, with regard to these reports, they are very significant. It can scarcely be said that these witnesses are to be discredited, for they are Filipino governors, governors of provinces in which civil government has been established. I do not know that I will read all of them, but I do desire to read extracts from some of them.

Mr. TELLER. What does the Senator read from?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am reading from the hearings before the Committee on the Philippines, and it will be about page 190. "Reports of provincial governors and others on general conditions in 23 provinces in which there is no insurrection." Will somebody tell me how many provinces are now under civil administration? I think there are 30.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. LODGE. Thirty-four.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Here are reports from 23 of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. All but 14 of them.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. All but 14.

Mr. HOAR. Who had appointed these governors?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I had already stated, if the Senator had been listening——

Mr. HOAR. I was listening.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That they had been appointed by the Philippine Commission, and I take it——

Mr. LODGE. Elections have since been held, and they have since been elected by the people.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Either they have been elected or others were elected in their place.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Elections! Think of it! Think of it, Senators, who talk about subjugation going on there! Elections are being held for municipal officers and provincial officers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. RAWLINS. Do I understand the Senator to state that all those governors are natives or Filipinos?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I judge that most of them are, from their names.

Mr. RAWLINS. Some of them are and some of them are not.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will read the names. I think that will be sufficient to justify the remark. I do not know that I can pronounce the names of these provinces, but the first is a report from the governor of the province of Ilocos Norte, and is dated December 17, 1901. That is not so very long ago. It is as follows:

CIVIL GOVERNOR, Manila:

In reply to your telegram of 17th instant. The people of this province are humble, very timid, and obedient. The law is complied with in a peaceful manner. Violations of law so far occurred only through deceit and impositions on part of people of other provinces.

AGBAYANI, Governor.

PROVINCE OF RIZAL.

I will not read all of this report, because it is long.

Rizal Province is composed of the 19 towns formerly a part of the province of Manila and the 14 towns belonging to the districts of Morong. Provincial government established on June 20, 1901. Municipalities were organized from June to September. In almost all the towns the justice courts are already in operation. The court of first instance has been established since July 11, 1901. Peace in Rizal is complete. All inhabitants are in favor of the civil government and devoted to American sovereignty.

Rizal is a province with 33 towns.

Then we come to the province of Pampanga. The name of the governor of the province is C. Joven.

At the present time this province is in the most peaceable condition. Many of the natives are highly educated, and since the introduction of the public schools under the United States Government a great improvement is noticed among the lower classes.

* * * * * * *

The few remaining malefactors and bandits in this province are being constantly traced and captured by the insular police. I believe that this province is in better condition than ever before, and under the present system of government will continue to improve, as affording an opportunity and inspiration to develop its resources.

Then we come to the province of Bulacan:

The province of Bulacan, under my charge, presents, politically considered, a sublime idea of its sincere gratitude and loyalty to the Government of the United States of America in the Philippine Archipelago.

I am justified in this statement by that very revolutionary spirit shown by the province in past times, and the readiness with which the inhabitants recognized the laudable intentions of the Government of the great North American nation in regard to this country and the urgent need for becoming thoroughly penetrated with the transcendent importance of peace, being convinced that only under peace can the welfare and uplifting of the Philippines under American rule be effected.

Then he refers to a certain time when civil government was established, and says:

From that time the province of Bulacan has been enjoying an unbroken peace, and its inhabitants, contented beyond measure with the establishment of civil rule in the Philippines, are doing all they can to strengthen that peace as a necessary basis for their happiness, thus showing their appreciation of the Government which now so wisely rules the destinies of this country.

A little further on I find:

The local governments organized under the new municipal code are being carried on with a fair regularity, and the pueblos—

Those are the towns, I suppose—are extremely contented with the personality, liberty, and responsibility of their municipios, as in all democratic countries.

That is signed Jose Serapio, provincial governor of Bulacan. I think he must be a Filipino.

Mr. TELLER. He is a Filipino.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I understand.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Then comes the province of Union. I do not know where that word came from, Mr. President, but I rather expect they have been renaming that province from a term which is so dear to the American people—the province of Union.

My report, which goes forward by special messenger in a few minutes, covers many pages, giving valuable information concerning province as to peace and general conditions. The province is perfectly peaceful, and this condition has existed for over a year. People are all at work in the fields and at their various professions. Civil government is accepted on every side—

Now, listen to this—and there is no possible reason to think that they will ever change in this feeling under the present form of government.

This is signed by Ortego, governor. Now I come to the province of Ambos Camarines. This is dated December 19, 1901:

Two small bands insurgents surrendered last September; since then no insurgent or hostile element in province. This condition is permanent so far as people of province concerned. No doubt sentiment is for continued peace and confidence intentions American Government.

That is signed James Ross, governor. He may be an American. Then I come to the province of Albay. This letter is directed to Governor Taft. It says:

Permit me to join with the natives and provincial officials of this province in wishing you a speedy recovery from your recent illness.

The people and the officers throughout this province have noticed from the periodicals a report of your return to the States, but we all sincerely hope you are not leaving the islands permanently. The people have the greatest confidence in your friendship and best wishes for their welfare, and many of them have requested me to beg of you not to leave the islands permanently. To this request of theirs permit me to add that of my own—that when your duties are completed in the States we may hope to again see you in the islands.

So they are not feeling that they are oppressed. He then goes on to say:

Schools have been organized in all pueblos and a greater part of the barrios. The nineteen leading pueblos in the province now have American instructors, and the progress they are making is exceptionally gratifying.

This is signed A. U. Betts, provincial governor. He may not be a Filipino; but here, I believe, is a Filipino—Potenciano Lesaca, provincial governor of the province of Zambales. He writes from Iba, Zambales, P. I., December 16, 1901, and the letter is directed to Hon. Mr. Wright, acting civil governor of the islands:

Your telegram of the 15th instant, in which you direct me to transmit a written report as to the peace conditions in this province, has been received by the provincial government, and I have the honor to report to you that the said conditions are truly satisfactory, so much so, in fact, that I can assert without the slightest exaggeration that in no point whatever of the province, including the most distant barrios of any pueblo, and even in the mountains, is there noticeable the slightest sign of the existence of a revolution, and nothing remains of the former revolution but the sad evidences of the damage caused by and through the war, which are manifest, unfortunately, in the greater or less losses in property and loved ones by the inhabitants of the province; and the victims of those losses, as harmful as they are regretted, can not but still feel them, though they suffer in patience and with Christian resignation.

Here is one signed P. Sison, provincial governor of the province of Pangasinan. He says:

In answer to your telegram of the 15th instant, asking for a report on the state of peace and the general conditions of the province, I have the honor to inform you that since civil régime has been established the inhabitants enjoy perfect tranquillity and comfort, and that their conditions are growing better each day under the new régime.

I can not read all of this. Here is one from the province of Sorsogon, signed by J. G. Livingston, provincial governor. He is probably an American, and from the standpoint of our friends on the other side of the Chamber is, therefore, not to be believed. He says:

I believe I can state with confidence that the civil government is working as well as could be expected and that the general conditions are good, and that with a few modifications of the laws, looking to a stricter watch over the people, keeping the restless at work, and preventing the scattering and isolation of families in the remote portions of the mountains, where they rapidly become but little better than savages, that the province of Sorsogon will rapidly develop and will remain peaceful. Then, when roads are built and communication between all the towns is made easy, the ignorance of the people, which is pitiable, will disappear.

All things considered, the general conditions are all that can be expected.

Here is another governor who is probably an American, and, therefore, I do not suppose that his testimony will be accepted by the other side; but I do hope the testimony of the Filipinos themselves will not be discredited. This is from the province of Leyte:

Out of 50 towns in the province, 44 have been organized under the municipal code and are exhibiting very gratifying results in the management of their municipal affairs. The remaining 6 received orders to hold elections on the first Tuesday in this month, so I presume that all of them are now organized, but the returns have not yet reached this office.

* * * * * * *

The people generally are anxious for civil government, and the officials elected in the various towns are developing, as a general rule, a very high degree of intelligence in the performance of their respective duties.

That the great majority of the people are happy and contented with their present condition is evidenced by the renewed activity displayed in all branches of industry. Agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing industries are taking on new life throughout the province, while the people are rebuilding their towns and homes, and are erecting, in many instances, substantial and comfortable buildings, instead of nipa shacks.

One of the most gratifying, and, to my mind, one of the most encouaging indications as demonstrating their appreciation of our institutions, as well as the popularity of the same, is the intense interest manifested among the masses to acquire a knowledge of the English language. During the current year the municipalities in this province have expended about 10,000 pesos in the construction and equipment of schoolhouses, which I think is quite a good showing for newly organized towns just recovering from the effects of a two or three years' war.

There are at present 36 American teachers on duty in the province, all of whom are doing excellent work. It affords me much pleasure to report that, with but one or two exceptions, there has been absolutely no friction between the padres and the schools, while quite a number of the padres have exhibited a desire to learn our language.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is reading about the schools. May I ask a question there?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask if the Senator has given—I was called from the Senate Chamber for a moment—the statement in regard to school-teachers that was made before the Philippine Committee?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I shall be obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts if he will give that.

Mr. LODGE. There are 835 American teachers in the islands, distributed in 445 towns. In 200 of those towns there are no American soldiers, and the school-teachers are there alone among the natives. There has been only one case of an American teacher being interfered with. He was carried by a band of insurrectos to the mountains and returned afterwards in safety. That is the only case of interference with teachers in 200 unoccupied towns.

Governor Taft also testified that after the time he left Manila and while he was on the water, garrisons had been withdrawn by General Chaffee from some 81 posts.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Here is a report from the provincial governor of Cagayan, dated Taguegarao, December 21, 1901. He says:

Peaceable condition of province is general and thoroughly established, which can be understood by contemplating the enthusiastic reception made to me at all towns where I hold municipal elections. People are very favorable to establishment of civil government and very obedient to the United States.

I shall not take the time of the Senate by reading further from these reports, but they are very interesting all through. They convince me, Mr. President, that we are making most rapid progress toward the establishment of peaceable, peaceful, and satisfactory government among the natives of the Philippines.

Mr. HOAR. I was informed by one of the clerks just now that there is in the possession of the Secretary's office but one copy of the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY] February 6, 1899, and adopted by the Senate, declaring the purpose of the United States toward the Philippine Islands. I hold that copy in my hand at this moment. I move that it be reprinted with the several amendments proposed and the several votes, including the list of yeas and nays. It will only make a very brief pamphlet altogether.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that joint resolution 240 of the Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, declaring the purpose of the United States toward the Philippine Islands, introduced by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY], together with the amendments which have been offered to it, and all votes which have been taken upon it by yeas and nays——

Mr. HOAR. Or upon the amendments——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Or upon the amendments, be printed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend by including also the vote on the treaty and the votes on the amendments offered to it——

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPOONER. The vote on the treaty of Paris as it passed, and the votes on the amendments offered to it. They have all been made public.

Mr. HOAR. I will accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] modifies his amendment by including that which is proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, what does the proposition embrace?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will embrace a reprint of the joint resolution, also of all the amendments offered to the resolution, also of all the yea-and-nay votes upon the resolution and the amendments to it, also the votes upon the treaty and upon the amendments offered to the treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. That is right.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will that contain an exact copy of the treaty itself in the beginning of the document?

Mr. SPOONER. That would be just as well. The Senator from Massachusetts has no objection to that?

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. The treaty itself ought to come first in the publication, so that we may be able to understand it.

Mr. SPOONER. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question to the Senate in that way.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have it in that way, so that when it is published the treaty will come first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to reprint the treaty, all the amendments to the treaty, and the votes upon them; also the votes upon the treaty itself, together with the other matters which have been stated to the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the statement of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], which was certainly, nobody will question, a very important statement; and, of course, coming from the Senator from Connecticut, it was a very clear and very sincere statement. I do not wish just now to enter upon a discussion of the particular point suggested by that statement; but there are two or three things that ought to be taken into consideration, and ought to be at some time explained in connection with that statement.

Just about a year ago, if I remember the date aright, there was presented—I will not be sure; I think I did not present it, but that it was presented by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]—a statement of, I think, 2,000 petitioners, citizens of Manila, containing, if I do not forget, the names of the leaders of what is conceded to be the very able bar there and of a large number of men of university education and the principal inhabitants—bankers, brokers, and business men. That place had been in the uninterrupted possession of the United States since the Spaniards left it. It was the headquarters of the activities of the Philippine Commission and of all American influence there; and with one accord the representatives of the wealth, intelligence, jurisprudence, and business interests of that community, no one of whom had ever been engaged in forcible resistance to our authority, declared that it was their desire and the desire of their people that they should have independence.

The Senator from Connecticut did not state the date of the document from which he read.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Oh, yes, I did. The first one was dated December 17, 1901, and I stated that the dates ran down to December 21 last.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to state that it must have been within eight, ten, or twelve months of that unanimous and most impressive appeal.

In addition to that, I myself presented petitions from a very large number indeed of the municipal authorities and leading men of the villages all through the civilized portion of the Philippine Islands, especially Luzon. They reminded me of the proceedings of the New England towns preceding our Revolutionary war. They were to the same purpose, but in general in different language. They were adopted by public meetings held at the townhouse or some place therein, with an equivalent name in their vocabulary, the principal inhabitants of each of those places assembling voluntarily to declare their purpose.

The language, usually that of some presiding officer or mover of the resolution, was elegant, clear, and impressive, and the handwriting was in general of a character indicating a degree of education and scholarship—all the citizens present, or most of them, signing these petitions, in these, I suppose, hundreds of communities—of a character indicating an education and scholarship superior to the ordinary country towns in my part of the country now, and quite equal, I think, to the average character of the members of this body, certainly very much superior to my own.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; but as this is a narrative, would it not be well for the Senator to wait until I have concluded it?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will interrupt the Senator but a moment. I wish to ask whether the Senator knows about what proportion of the inhabitants of those several villages were represented by the actual signers?

Mr. HOAR. These petitions were certified to by the village authorities in all cases where the meetings were held at the towns. I do not know what proportion they represented, but the number of signers in each case was not very large—from 30 to 40 or 50.

Now, what has happened since? We have some knowledge of how human nature works. I hear something of the Asiatic mind on both sides of this debate. The one great record in history or literature of the Asiatic mind is the Old Testament, which seems to me more like the working of the mind that I have known and been brought up to know as the American and English mind than any other in all history or literature. But I assume that human nature is the same in many respects everywhere; that there is a love of country, and Mr. Taft says that that passion exists in the Philippines; that there is a love of liberty there. Our great American philosopher declares that God will take the sun out of the sky ere freedom out of man.

What has happened since? There has been an absolute disarming of that people. These declarations which the Senator from Connecticut turned over as a sweet morsel under his tongue are the declarations of a conquered and disarmed people—disarmed by a great army, drilled and disciplined, and apt for fighting as no other like army on earth. They have gotten from all these people every weapon of defense.

I do not enter upon any question of the processes by which these men were led to give up their weapons, because I do not mean to make any charge against the honor of the officers or the soldiers of my country until some investigation, where both sides have been heard, has shown that it is warranted; and I will say here that if investigation shall show that it is warranted I know the Senators who differ with me on this general question will be as swift and as zealous to express their indignation as I or any other man can be. But whatever may have been the processes, the result is accomplished.

Mr. President, that has been accomplished by an army of ours. The Senator says there are some 3,000 Filipino soldiers against the 40,000 Americans there now. Are there any Filipino officers of high rank among that brave and intelligent people? Is there a man who as yet we have trusted to command a military force to be levied against these proceedings of resistance, which the Senator would have us believe are as odious to the Filipinos in general as to us?

There is another thing. The Senator quotes from the certificates of certain provincial governors who reported to Governor Taft, and who testified to the delightful condition of things, but the governors whom he quotes are all appointed by American power—every one of them—and paid by American money. Does the Senator think that certificates as to the condition of public sentiment when our Revolutionary war broke out, or even when it had been going on for a year, made to the British Parliament by the Tory governors of that time, would have been accepted anywhere as of great historical value?

Another thing. My honorable and enthusiastic friend from Connecticut spoke two or three times over of the fact that they had had elections, and he said "elections," "elections," "elections." Well, they had something they called elections. But it is a little peculiar to the American understanding to hear of an election, or at any rate, to hear of a man from Connecticut speaking about it in this debate when it is a penitentiary offense for everybody who takes part in it to advocate any political opinion whatever.

An election! An election, if I may imitate my friend, where there is to be no freedom of speech, no discussion, everybody putting in his vote clad in a straight waistcoat and liable to have his tongue cut out, or something much worse, if he suggests to one of his fellow-citizens any political opinion whatever!

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. To what does the Senator refer?

Mr. HOAR. I refer to the enactment of the Commission read here. I wonder if the Senator has in his possession the platform upon which those governors ran? Has he the resolutions of the meetings where they were nominated? Has he the speeches which were made? Here was an election by a free people, 10,000,000 in number or thereabouts, three times as many as we had when we elected General Washington after the Revolution, and he can not for the life of him tell us on what platform the men ran, what speech any candidate made, or that even a political party could have been formed without sending every member of it to the penitentiary. It seems very natural to the Senator from Connecticut that that should happen. I should like to see them try it once in that dear little State of Connecticut, which I love as he does, and get the reports from the selectmen of the various towns of the great content of that people.

Then, an election without debate. All the inhabitants, according to my honorable friend, devoted to American sovereignty. All of them have been changed by a conversion as sudden as that of St. Paul, although the light and voice may have come from a very different quarter. But all converted within six short months—six short months having been devoted to making every man of them give up his arms and hunting through the mountains for the men who had been their leaders up to that time. And then they come in with their election, without debate, for it is treason to have a political debate. They are all dreadfully in love with American citizenship!

Another thing that struck me as rather comical, if I may be allowed to take any comedy out of this tragedy, was when the Senator read that the Filipinos were all growing in appreciation of our institutions. What are those institutions of ours that they appreciate?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Free schools.

Mr. HOAR. Disarming the citizens, having elections without debates, and having the local chief magistrates appointed by a foreign country. Those are our institutions as we translate them to the Philippine Islands.

Free schools, cries out an enthusiastic youth on my left. Free schools! What kind of free schools? We teach citizenship in our free schools. We have an American flag over the schoolhouse. Can they teach citizenship in the Filipino free schools or have a Filipino flag—the flag of the country—hanging over the schoolhouse?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The American flag.

Mr. HOAR. Can they read to those scholars, as was suggested during the debate, the Declaration of Independence, or the great amendments to our Constitution, and tell them there is the great foundation of citizenship? Can the little boy of 10 or 15 in a class in those free schools say that he loves liberty; that all men are created equal, and that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed? The poor little fellow will have to be sent first to the coal bin and then to the penitentiary. These are what are called free schools, and that is the way they are to teach appreciation of our institutions.

What do the children in our free schools do? They do not sit on Washington's birthday. They read the Farewell Address, but you might as well put a spark of fire into a powder mine as to have Washington's Farewell Address read in one of those free schools where they teach American institutions.

The free school here at home does not keep on the Fourth of July, but the Filipino school, if it does not keep, can not at least have anything said such as we say here on the Fourth of July. I wonder if they speak pieces in the free schools in the Philippine Islands. When we were young we used to speak a speech made by a Revolutionary villain named Patrick Henry, "Give me liberty or give me death."

I wonder if they speak that piece we used to speak in our humble way—Chatham's famous speech, the one finest oratoric utterance in all human history since the time of Greece—"Sir, I rejoice that America has resisted." I should like to hear a little chap out in a Philippine schoolhouse speak that. I wonder if Warren's address to his troops is one of the ways in which they teach the little fellow to appreciate American institutions:

> Stand! The ground's your own, my braves;
> Will you give it up to slaves?

Or Marco Bozzaris's address to his soldiers, which we used to know by heart? I wonder if they would allow the little fellow to speak a Fourth of July oration—and I have no doubt he has delivered a great many—by my honorable friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE.]

I will venture to say, without having read them—and I should be a wiser and better man if I had—that there is not a Filipino free school in which any Fourth of July address he ever delivered in his life, or until within the last five years, or any important political speech he ever delivered in his life, or until within the last four or five years, would be allowed to be uttered by the school boy.

I hope the rosy view of my friend the Senator from Connecticut will turn out to be all right, but I confess I am afraid he will have to try again.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, my respect for the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] for his long and distinguished and able service to his country prevent me from replying in the tone in which I should reply to another Senator if he had delivered the speech which has been delivered by the Senator from Massachusetts. The people of the country will be sincerely sorry if they read this speech and mark his sneers at the efforts which we are making to educate the children of the Philippine Islands.

But I must allude to the premises upon which he bases his remarks. He says the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] presented here, something like a year ago, a petition with 2.000 signatures attached from people in the city of Manila asking for independence, and that he, the Senator from Massachusetts, presented resolutions which had been passed at town meetings in the Philippine Islands expressive of the same desire. I remember that he took occasion then to say that he believed or thought that the people who signed their names to those resolutions were more intelligent, and I do not know but that he said more patriotic than the citizens of the country towns in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. No; I did not say that, Mr. President. I said they would compare very well with them so far as could be gathered from the indications of the handwriting and the language and the style of the paper.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think he said to-day—the RECORD when it is published in the morning will show whether he is correct or I am—that those petitions and the handwriting showed a condition of education and development in those towns which surpassed that of the country towns of Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me? I am sure he does not want to misrepresent me. I said in the mere matter of handwriting they were, I thought, equal to the average of this body, and far superior to my own.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It struck me very strangely when he commented upon these petitions last year. It struck me equally strangely to-day. I can not understand what has come over the spirit of the Senator's dream which makes him think that the people of the Philippine Islands, if they do not surpass the people of Massachusetts, are their equals in all respects.

From this petition of 2,000 people in the city of Manila and from these resolutions which were passed in the town meetings expressing a desire for independence, the Senator considers that the fact has been conclusively established that all the people of the Philippine Islands are or were then earnestly desirous of independence.

What is the fact, Mr. President? The city of Manila is a city of 300,000 inhabitants; I think more than that—between three and four hundred thousand inhabitants. Here was a petition which we have a right to suppose was signed by all the people who could be found to sign it in the city of Manila; and whether they were men or women or children, who they were that signed that petition, how it was obtained, we know nothing; but it is paraded here now, as it was then, as conclusive evidence, which must not be questioned, that the people of Manila all desire independence, and that we are proceeding to stifle their desire for liberty and independence.

Then we come to the resolutions that were said to have been signed in town meetings. How they were procured, by whom they were suggested, whether by the junta at Hongkong or in Boston, nobody knows. They had a suspicious similarity which indicated that they had been prepared in some one source outside of those towns. They read and appeared very much as that class of petitions which we here in the Senate call machine petitions, which come to us on printed heads from all over the country on occasions.

But I insist that however honestly they might have been obtained, and however honestly the petition of 2,000 people in a city of 300,000 inhabitants or over might have been obtained, it is not, and it was not then, to be regarded as conclusive evidence of a determination not to accept the Government of the United States in the Philippine Islands and its sway.

Then, having thus established what the Senator supposes is the fact, having produced what he seems to think incontrovertible proof of that fact, he asks what has happened since to change the minds of the people. The Senator himself scarcely questions the accuracy of the representation of the conditions there at present. I think no Senator on this floor will go that far. Here are five men in those islands constituting the American part of the Philippine Commission.

The Commission consists of eight, three Filipinos serving upon the Commission, whose names I do not know. But I want to state the names of the American commissioners. It is well to recall them in the Senate of the United States from time to time. They are men than whom now no higher stand in the country, or ever stood in the country, for intelligence, for patriotism, for truthfulness, for honesty of purpose, or for ability. I refer to Taft, Worcester, Wright, Ide, and Moses. What these men say about the conditions of the Philippine Islands is to be whistled down the winds by the sneers of our friends on the other side, reenforced by the Senator from Massachusetts. I propose to trust those men as not misrepresenting the situation in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to ask the Senator what he would think if he finds it to be true that all the military officers have exactly the opposite opinion from the opinion held by the commissioners?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have no evidence that all the military officers hold a different opinion, and I do not believe it is true; but I think the Senator from Tennessee himself will scarcely go to the extent of trying to discredit in the United States Senate and before the American people the honesty, integrity, patriotism, and ability of Luke Wright, of Tennessee. We have some officers out there——

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. Of course I do not mean to impeach the honesty or the patriotism of Mr. Wright, but I do say that I believe General MacArthur has more accurate information as to the conditions existing in the islands than has General Wright or Governor Taft either.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We have some officers out there. We have Generals Chaffee and Hughes and Davis and Bell and Grant, and if those five officers, gallant and brave, could have stood in this Chamber the last week and heard what Senators have said about the condition in the Philippine Islands, I think they could not have refrained from taking part in that debate themselves.

The Senator from Massachusetts says, what has happened to change the condition which he had so conclusively established, that the people a year ago were all opposed to the American Government, to American sovereignty, and to the continuance of our Government there, and were all earnestly clamoring for and demanding absolute independence. I will tell one or two things that have happened there, besides the disarmament of the people.

But right here as I progress I wish to say that if we have been by force and wickedness disarming a people, and the evidence shows that in twelve months after disarmament there exists no latent hostility to the Government of the United States, but everywhere a desire to submit to its sovereignty and to come under the beneficence of its sway, it is certainly evidence of very remarkable progress toward that condition of things which we all desire shall prevail in those islands.

But I will tell you one other thing that has happened. This Commission, composed of the men whom I have mentioned, have since that date gone into 34 provinces in those islands and asked the people there to establish civil government for themselves, and the people have taken them at their word and established civil government there. A very wicked thing, apparently, it is thought, that these eight men, five Americans and three Filipinos, composing the Commission, have been doing. But it is satisfactory to the people of the islands. We have been doing some other things there.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Does he think that if the treason law had been submitted to the people of the Philippine Islands by a referendum and debated they would have adopted it?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am not sufficiently familiar, perhaps, with what is called the treason law, and I will not stop now to discuss that proposition. I will say, however, that in my own State we have a law which we have never thought was inconsistent with our rights or our liberties, and which I in my own State am ready to discuss and defend. I wish to read it. After the law which relates to treason and misprision of treason we have this statute in Connecticut:

SEC. 1398. Every person in this State who shall in time of war or rebellion against this State or the United States, directly or indirectly, commence or carry on any intercourse with any enemy or rebel, or with any person, for the purpose of being communicated to him with intent to aid him or to defeat or embarrass the measures of the government of this State or of the United States, or shall, directly or indirectly, sell or transport, or attempt to transport to such enemy or rebels arms, munitions of war, or provisions, or supplies of any kind, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned in the State prison not less than three nor more than seven years, or both.

As I understand that statute, Mr. President, there are certain persons living in the State of the Senator from Massachusetts who, if they had come into the State of Connecticut and commenced to carry on intercourse with the Filipinos with intent to aid them or to defeat or embarrass the measures of the government of the State or of the United States, would have subjected themselves to the penalty of this statute; and yet the people of Connecticut have not been chafing under it. The people of Connecticut think that is right, and that a man who, when there is a rebellion against the State or the United States, enters into communication with the enemy for the purpose of embarrassing the operations of the State or United States, commits a crime, and subjects himself to punishment.

I undertake to say that not only the people of Connecticut, but the people of Massachusetts who live right around Fanueil Hall will say that is right; and when anyone with arms in his hands anywhere that the United States is entitled to sovereignty is resisting that sovereignty he is an enemy of the United States, and that anyone who corresponds with him to encourage him to continue in that hostility to the United States commits a crime and deserves punishment.

But, Mr. President, this is a diversion. We have done some other things there. We have established schools, at which I am sorry to hear the sneers of the Senator directed. We have sent out a thousand American teachers there to teach them the institutions of our Government with the language which those institutions have always accompanied and always will accompany.

But before that we did some things that no other government on earth ever did. We established schools in the Philippine Islands before we sent these civilian teachers there, and we detailed privates from this Regular Army of ours, so denounced in this Chamber, to teach those schools.

I knew one of those teachers, a private detailed from a company of the Regular Army. When he first established the school, not more than a dozen pupils could attend, and they had to be brought there by the police. They came naked, with an idea that they were being brought to a place of punishment. But very soon they learned that dress was something which the American Government signified. They were soon clad in the ordinary habiliments of scholars. They exhibited an eagerness to learn and to learn the English language which was fairly surprising, and when the American teachers went there and this private was relieved from the school he had 160 scholars as intelligent, as well-mannered, and eager to learn as scholars anywhere on the face of the earth. What other country ever detailed private soldiers to teach school in its conquered country?

Those things we have done, Mr. President, and to my mind they account for the change which has come over the people of the Philippine Islands. They see that we mean them well. They see that we would do them good. They see that we would lead them toward a new civilization and a better life. They see that under our institutions, under our Government, they are to enjoy a degree of liberty, free speech, and happiness which they could never have enjoyed under the Government of Spain or under a government of the much praised and sainted Aguinaldo.

Now, Mr. President, in the sneers which the Senator from Massachusetts has seen fit to indulge in with reference to this most patriotic, beneficent work in the Philippine Islands, he refers, with his usual inaccuracy, to a statute, and, as I understood him to say—the RECORD will tell to-morrow morning whether he said it or not—he said that at an election in the Philippine Islands no man could express a political opinion without having his tongue cut out or some other terrible thing done to him.

Let us see what that statute is. What is it? The Senator says that under this statute you shall not discuss the issues of an election when an election is pending. Let us see if that is so.

> All persons who shall meet together for the purpose of forming, or who shall form, any secret society, or who shall after the passage of this act continue membership in a society already formed having for its object, in whole or in part, the promotion of treason, rebellion, or sedition, or the promulgation of any political opinion or policy, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Is there anything in that which prevents free speech at an election or preceding an election, or which prohibits the declamation of those grand things to which the Senator has referred, the stirring phrases of Marco Bozzaris or of Warren's address? Not at all, Mr. President. It seems strange that human observation can be so warped as to draw such conclusions.

It does prohibit secret societies, as this Government ought to prohibit the secret doings of the anarchists. It does prohibit secret societies aimed at the existence of government, as we ought in this country to prohibit and punish membership in secret societies organized for the purpose of destroying government.

Mr. PATTERSON. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does not section 9 prohibit the formation of secret societies for the promulgation of any political opinion or policy whatsoever?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have quoted it verbatim et literatim. That statute is aimed primarily at secret societies having for their object, in whole or in part, the promotion of treason, rebellion, or sedition, and this further clause is added, "for the promulgation of any political opinion or policy." But it is not a prohibition of public discussion. It can not be so construed.

It is a statute aimed at secret plotting against the Government and our government there. It is a statute aimed at that plotting which in the city of Manila at one time came near breaking out into a massacre of our troops and our citizens and our friends.

Whether that clause be wise and proper or not, it does not justify the inference drawn by the Senator from Massachusetts in his disparagement of our school operations in the Philippine Islands. It does not prevent the reading of the Declaration of Independence. It does not prevent discussion preceding elections. It prevents nothing that is in the open. It prevents plotting in the dark against the Government and its authority.

Now, Mr. President, let us argue this question as it is. Let us see what the fact is. Do not let us shut our eyes to the real condition of things there and go back into the early period of this discussion and now occupy ourselves not merely with thrashing over old straw, but the stirring up of moldy straw. Do not let us take for granted every word of criticism, every word of opposition that has been made upon our Government, upon its officers, civil and military.

Do not let us take the ground that they are all to be discredited and not believed, and that even the slightest whisper which comes from over the water from Manila itself, from the junta in Hongkong, from the anti-imperialistic societies of this country (few, I am happy to say) are to outweigh and overthrow the testimony of our best, our ablest, our most trustworthy officials.

We attribute improper motives and improper objects and purposes to our civil authorities in the Philippine Islands, to our military authorities there. Why this eagerness to catch up everything which is said against them, to impute to them every bad motive, every cruelty ever practiced anywhere in the world? Mr. President, I can not account for it; it seems to me absolutely unaccountable.

The truth about this whole matter is that we acquired these islands, as the Senator from Colorado says, legally, rightfully, and, as he admits, they are under the sovereignty of the United States. However it may have occurred, there was rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States there, and it was no more justifiable there than it would be in the State of Massachusetts or in the Territory of New Mexico.

If we are a Government worthy of the name, worthy of living, worthy of a place in the present or the future, whenever men take arms against the Government of the United States in any country, district, or territory where the sovereignty of the United States prevails we will put down that rebellion; and it does not make any difference, Mr. President, whether it is in the Philippine Islands, or the District of Columbia, or the district of Alaska, or in South Carolina, or in any State of this Union. No perversion of the doctrine of independence and no perversion of the glory of liberty is going to convince this American people that it is not only its right but its duty to itself to put down armed resistance against the Government wherever it may rear its hateful head.

I do not want to say anything to revive the memories of the saddest war of recent times, but I can not refrain from alluding to the fact that for four long years we resisted this doctrine that government in its strict and literal sense depended upon the consent of the governed, and that eleven States and the people of those States, claiming that they could not be coerced, claiming that they were struggling for liberty and establishing an independence of their own, for four long years fought that question out with us, and we prevailed.

And now, if I understand, we have done the same thing in the Philippines. Some people over there, a few only compared with the great mass of people, followed the fortunes of one Aguinaldo. Did he have any consent of the governed to rely upon? If the doctrine of the consent of the governed must be strictly enforced here, I inquire what consent of the governed this vaunted and eulogized Aguinaldo had in the Philippine Islands? What right had he, any more than we, to demand the right to govern those islands?

Why, it is an open and uncontradicted truth that he did not represent a majority, a third, a fourth, or a fifth of the whole people of the Philippine Archipelago in that effort of his to subjugate that people and deprive them of their liberties. Oh, the subjugation of that people by Aguinaldo is praiseworthy, but the insistence that when we have sovereignty there our sovereignty must be respected is discreditable.

But time went on, and Aguinaldo surrendered. His army—and he had one once—vanished. There was no organized army left; and we have now before us, Mr. President, evidence which tends to show, to be followed by evidence which I believe will conclusively show, that in all that we have done and all that we now propose to do we have in the Philippine Islands the consent of the people of those islands.

Now, what is all this about, Mr. President? We had after that four years of war the consent of the people of the South to come back under the old flag, and they rejoice in it to-day, and we alike with them rejoice, and the animosities of that contest are forgotten. We have one flag in this country, thank God, and around that and under that flag we rally with a fraternal feeling that we never felt before we tried out the question whether a people demanding independence from the sovereignty of the United States were entitled to it.

We tried that out in the Philippines as we did in those eleven States, and the result is the same. The men who were in arms against us are now quite content to come in with us under our flag. If the testimony of these Filipino governors of those provinces is to be believed, we are either now in a position where we have this consent of the governed that American authority shall be maintained there, or we are rapidly securing that consent.

I can not understand, Mr. President, what it is that so excites our friends on the other side. I can not understand why these principles of liberty and independence and free government, in which we all believe and glory, are appealed to here in this juncture to show that we should now, having arrived at a point, or certainly nearly arrived there, where we have the consent of the people of those islands, abandon them, drop them, as was said the other day, recall our troops and leave them to the formation of such a government as they may choose to form, whether a republic, a monarchy, an empire, an autocracy, or whatever government some ambitious chieftain may be able to establish in those islands. Oh, no, Mr. President.

I did not intend to be drawn into these remarks, but the Senator from Colorado seems to have adopted the old Zoroastrian system of religion, of a good and an evil god. He says that if there is any call upon us to do what we have been doing in the Philippine Islands it must be the bad god whose voice we are listening to and not the good God that he wishes to follow.

Notwithstanding what the Senator from Colorado has said, notwithstanding the frequent remarks we hear on the other side that there is no moral obligation, no Christian duty resting upon us to do anything more in the Philippine Islands than to return from them, I do think that we are under the obligation and direction of a higher power with reference to our duty in the Philippine Islands.

Talk about commercialism! Is this matter to be weighed by bookkeeping to see where the balance of advantage is in dollars and cents? I think the United States of America has a high call to duty, to a moral duty, to a duty to advance the cause of free government in the world by something more than example. It is not enough to say to a country over which we have acquired an undisputed and indisputable sovereignty: "Go your own gait; look at our example. In the entrance of the harbor of New York, our principal port, there is the statue of Liberty Enlightening the World. Look at that, and follow our example."

No, Mr. President. When the Anglo-Saxon race crossed the Atlantic and stood on the shores of Massachusetts Bay and on Plymouth Rock that movement meant something more than the establishment of religious and civil liberty within a narrow, confined, and limited compass. It had in it the force of the Almighty; and from that day to this it has been spreading, widening, and extending until, like the stone seen by Daniel in his vision cut out of the mountain without hands, it has filled all our borders, and ever westward across the Pacific that influence which found its home in the Mayflower and its development on Plymouth Rock has been extending and is extending its sway and its beneficence.

I believe, Mr. President, that the time is coming, as surely coming as the time when the world shall be Christianized, when the world shall be converted to the cause of free government, and I believe the United States is a providentially appointed agent for that purpose. The day may be long in coming, and it may be in the far future, but he who has studied the history of this western world from the 22d day of December, 1620, to the present hour must be blind indeed if he can not see that the cause of free government in the world is still progressing and that what the United States is doing in the Philippine Islands is in the extension of that beneficent purpose.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think I ought to detain the Senate by a word or two in justice to myself and in justice to a great cause.

I can not return the taunt of my honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] in regard to the matter of inaccuracy. I am not prepared to say that inaccuracy is usual with that Senator. He is only inaccurate when he undertakes to deal with great questions of public liberty, of the history of freedom and of constitutional law; but it will take but one brief moment to see how inaccurate he is in those matters.

The Senator from Connecticut began by being inaccurate in his quotation of what I said when he represented me as saying that the people in those Philippine towns meetings were superior to the people of Massachusetts, or that the people who signed the petitions, the great lawyers and bankers and business men in Manila, were superior to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I did not say that.

Mr. HOAR. What I said was that in the matter of handwriting, which is some token and test of education, the men there would compare favorably with Senators who sat about me and wrote a much better hand than I myself did, and that the proceedings of the village communities did not suffer in comparison with the proceedings of ours during the Revolutionary war. But that is a trifle.

The Senator criticised the character of the petitions to which I adverted. When I spoke of 2,000 petitioners, which was my recollection, confirmed by that of another Senator——

Mr. TELLER. Still more than that.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Colorado says the number is still more. The Senator from Connecticut says it is to be presumed that they got all the petitioners they could, and that that is a small number in a city of 300,000 inhabitants. Was it ever heard that the petitions of bankers, of brokers, of business men, of boards of trade, which come from our cities have larger numbers, or that they are in the habit of trying to get all the petitioners they can when they send us their views about public questions?

The Senator says that nobody knows what was the character of those meetings in the rural communities, hundreds of them, if I recollect. The Senator is inaccurate there. Somebody does know, and the Senate knows if it chooses to open its eyes. They were certified to by the town authorities then existing, presided over usually by the chief magistrate of the town at the meetings, and expressed their opinions at the townhouse.

Mr. President, these are small inaccuracies, if any mistake can be small in a gentleman charged in part with the honor of a great republic and the right, the justice, and the liberty of another smaller but still numerous people.

The Senator is also inaccurate when he talks about the doctrine of the consent of the governed. He says we voted that down when we put down our brethren who were in arms against us during the civil war.

We did not do any such thing. We only claimed that the doctrine of the consent of the governed was applicable to the right of one people to trample another under their feet, and that the Southern people were one with us, not a separate people, and had consented when they came into the Union at the beginning to be the people of the United States with us, and had submitted by their own consent—I am not saying whether we were right or wrong, but that was our doctrine, which prevailed—and had submitted with one consent all their States to a declaration that the laws of the United States and the Constitution should be the governing law for them forevermore, unless constitutionally amended, anything in the law or constitution of any State whatever to the contrary notwithstanding. Is not that the consent of the governed that we stood on? We were carrying out the constitutional consent of the governed on the most important occasion in human history.

Mr. President, Abraham Lincoln, whose utterances would be treason under the beautiful statute which the Senator from Connecticut inaccurately read, declared on his way to be inaugurated, knowing well through what peril even at that time he was journeying, in a speech in Philadelphia that this great doctrine of the consent of the governed was one for which, if need be, he was ready to be assassinated. It seems as if his prophetic soul foresaw his fate.

This citation of the case of the civil war by my honorable friend from Connecticut is of a piece with the parrot utterances that we hear of late, that Jefferson, when he accepted Louisiana, was not standing by the great doctrine he had declared, and that Sumner, when he got through the bill for the purchase of Alaska, was not standing by it.

Sumner made an elaborate speech, in which he said that he was not departing from that doctrine, for which he also was ready to be a martyr. The gentlemen who think so are sincere, undoubtedly, but if the necessities of this case and this crisis shall demand it of them they will be ready to persuade themselves next that the Saviour of mankind never believed the doctrine of the Sermon on the Mount and never practiced the Golden Rule.

Mr. President, let us now come to the Connecticut statute, the statute which my honorable friend read. The Connecticut statute, like the statute of treason passed by the United States Government in 1790, was leveled at the crime of rendering aid and comfort to a foreign foe. Even then it was surrounded by the safeguards which I mentioned the other day and which the Senator from Colorado mentioned here to-day. It was a crime which would warrant and would cause any mother to disown her son, any wife to disown her husband, any sister to disown a brother, and any son to reject the name of his father.

But is it for that reason that it is decent or fitting, when a great people are standing together for their independence, to put that in practice in such a case? We did not disturb our own statute of treason, it is true, during the civil war, but we never brought one human being to trial under it.

Even then it was not considered that it should be put in force. We felt, as Burke said he did, that we could not draw an indictment against a whole people. It would have filled mankind with horror if this Connecticut statute or if our statute of treason of 1790 had been enacted in 1861, or at any time thereafter, to be put in force against Tennessee, or Virginia, or Kentucky, or Missouri. That is the trouble with my honorable friend from Connecticut.

It was said once that an eminent and well-known public man, who used to cite historic examples for what he did, made up his character of the faults and crimes of all the great men who had previously lived; and the Senator from Connecticut seems to think we should fill our statute books with the cruelties or the perverted meaning of all the great statutes of the past.

Now, Mr. President, come to this statute for a moment, and let us see what kind of an election the Senator refers to. The Senator read this statute inaccurately in emphasis——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I am going to read what the Senator did not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If I read it inaccurately, it was the result of a slip of the tongue. I think I read every word of it.

Mr. HOAR. Well, let us see. The Senator from Connecticut said that there had been elections which showed that the people of the Philippine Islands did not desire their independence, but that they were content with what he called the sovereignty of the United States. Sovereignty used to be a thing that could not be bought with gold over an unwilling people or could not be won by force of arms, as the United States understood the law of nations. But let that pass.

Those elections were had under this law. Did the Senator read section 10?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. Then he did not read the part of the law which applies to what we are talking about, and when a Senator leaves out a part of the law which applies to what he is talking about he reads it inaccurately, in my opinion. [Laughter.]

SEC. 10. Until it has been officially proclaimed that a state of war or insurrection against the authority or sovereignty of the United States no longer exists in the Philippine Islands it shall be unlawful—for any person to advocate, orally or by writing or printing, or like methods, the independence of the Philippine Islands or their separation from the United States, whether by peaceable or forcible means, or to print, publish, or circulate any handbill, newspaper, or other publication advocating such independence or separation.

Will Senators give me their attention—

Now, here is an election from which this is determined by my honorable friend the Senator from Connecticut who is sending his notions of public liberty around the world, and they settle in that election the opinion of the people of the Philippine Islands on this very question of independence under a law which sends a man to the penitentiary for a year if he advocates one side of the question, even by peaceable means, or if he "print, publish, or circulate any handbill, newspaper, or other publication, advocating such independence or separation." And it is my "usual inaccuracy" that thinks that that was not a fair election according to American ideas, and that it does not disclose to us the true opinion of a people who have been forcibly disarmed within six months.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from Massachusetts referred to section 9.

Mr. HOAR. I referred to section 10.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. In the remarks to which I replied I understood him to refer to section 9.

Mr. HOAR. Did the Senator know of section 10 when he made his speech?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I did.

Mr. HOAR. He did. The Senator knew of section 10 when he made his speech, and he knew that the elections were held under that law; and then he did not read the law, but declared the election was conclusive evidence that these people were now fond of our rule, and then he criticised me for inaccuracy.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly. I will not only permit the Senator, but I shall be delighted to have some explanation.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The election of which he speaks and of which he says I spoke, I spoke of in this way originally. I was referring to the civil governors appointed by the Philippine Commission.

Mr. HOAR. That is not an election.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from Massachusetts said they had now been elected.

Mr. HOAR. No, I did not.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I mean the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon.

Mr. LODGE. I stated that an election had been held. It is true; it has been held.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Those are the only elections to which I referred.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Connecticut is again inaccurate. He alluded to the reports furnished us by the governors of these places, and he said that they had elections.

Mr. LODGE. They have had.

Mr. HOAR. And that those elections indicated the contentment of the people with the rule of the United States, and that they no longer had any desire for independence; and then he read part of section 9, the part of this statute which did not apply. I call his attention to the fact that these elections were held under the law which sent every man who was in favor of one side of the question, which he says was settled by them, to the penitentiary for saying so. Am I inaccurate now?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No. The Senator from Massachusetts is infallible. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. I think I am not inaccurate, and I am very glad that when I put that grave and great question to the Senator he has not anything but a very small joke for a reply.

Now, let us go back to section 9 for a moment, and see if the Senator was accurate when he said it applied only to secret societies to propagate anarchy. In the first place, did I correctly understand the Senator to say that?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I did not say that.

Mr. HOAR. He did not say that. Then he does not say it now, I suppose, and he did not then. I understood him to say that. The RECORD will show whether or not I correctly caught his meaning. But let us see:

All persons who shall meet together for the purpose of forming, or who shall form, any secret society—

I do not like secret societies very well; I never belonged to one in my life, but I wonder what our Masons and Odd Fellows and A. P. A.'s and other societies think of that, Master Brook, for a law in the year of grace 1902, which is to be sent around the world, according to the Senator, as showing the glory of American institutions. But let us go a little further—or who shall, after the passage of this act, continue membership in a society—

Not now a secret society, but any society—

already formed—

Is not a political party a society, I should like to know, and if a man continues membership in any political society already formed—having for its object, in whole or in part—

I leave out the words "the promotion of treason, rebellion, or sedition"— or the promulgation of any political opinion or policy.

Any political opinion or policy! If you continue a member of it you are to go to the penitentiary for not exceeding one year. And that is freedom? What an eminent Republican statesman, now withdrawn from public life, described in one of his felicitous phrases as "canned liberty," which we are engaged in sending to this distant region.

I shall not detain the Senate long at this late hour, although I have several other things which I should like to talk about. I wish to allude only to one other thing. The Senator mourns that we can not accept the opinion of the Philippine Commission and of Governor Taft. He has not quite concluded giving his opinion yet, but let that pass. He has given a good deal of it which has been quoted.

I like and respect Governor Taft, and I dare say his associates deserve—perhaps all of them; certainly some of them—the eulogy which the Senator has pronounced. But the trouble in believing Governor Taft and his Commission is that we are met by the Army officers, who tell us a very different story. Governor Taft meets a Filipino gentleman who comes to see him when he goes to a city—whether the Filipino gentleman be sincere or otherwise I can not say—and he tells him a glowing story, rose-colored and optimistic, and he reports it.

The governor does not have to look out for the men when they are situated where they can strike a blow, but the Army officer does. He is all over that country in the person of his soldiers and subordinates. He is getting reports all the time from his military organization, and officials and instrumentalities, and he tells you that you must have many thousand troops for a long period in the Philippines. Now, which are we to believe?

I might as well turn on my friend, the Senator from Connecticut, and say, will you not accept the honor of an American soldier and the sagacity of an American officer? We have unfortunately to choose between two sources of testimony, the soldier and the civilian.

I have been told that even in Manila there are ladies, the wives of famous soldiers, who never sit down in a room without having their back to the wall for fear of a blow being struck at them. I do not know anything about that at all, and I am certainly not able to establish it except by the testimony of one single witness, so I do not put any stress on it.

But the United States can not sit down in quiet among these people that so long for its sovereignty and cry for it as children cry for Mrs. Winslow's soothing sirup. The people of the United States can not sit down without placing their backs to the walls or without 40,000 or 50,000 soldiers to defend them. That is a fact, and that fact helps us determine whether we will take the evidence of the civilian or the soldier.

These things that I have stated constitute another fact. Governor Taft, if he is correctly reported, says that these people are in favor of our sovereignty and do not want independence. If that be true, why does Governor Taft accompany that declaration by saying that if a man advocates that independence by peaceable means, without a thought of forcible resistance, he must go to the penitentiary for not more than a year?

Mr. President, I have learned to trust men, even the greatest and the best men, not by what they say but by what they do; and when Governor Taft says that the Filipino people do not want independence, and says at the same time nobody shall express that desire above his breath, I distrust the opinion, and for evidence of the fact look to the act.

When he says that the people are enjoying American freedom and at the same time he promulgates a law that makes it a penitentiary offense to read the Declaration of Independence on the Fourth of July, I confess I am very little impressed by his judgment and very profoundly impressed by his edict.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 12, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 11, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ALLEN of Maine, for five days, on account of important business.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the pension appropriation bill with a Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 3, line 8, after "prescribe," insert:

"And provided further, That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in securing the passage of any special act of Congress granting pension or increase of pension; and any person who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, receive, or retain any compensation for such services shall be deemed guilty of an offense, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the amendment and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. BARNEY, Mr. VAN VOORHIS, and Mr. BELL.

ARREARAGES OF TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10076) to receive arrearages of taxes due the District of Columbia July 1, 1900, at 6 per cent per annum in lieu of penalties and costs.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House consider the following concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed, in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 9315, to insert the word "thirteenth," on page 9, in line 9, in lieu of the word "thirtieth."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, that is merely to correct an error in the date. I ask the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the unanimous consent of the House should be had first. Without objection, this resolution will be now considered. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

OLEOMARGARINE BILL.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bill H. R. 9206.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LACEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the oleomargarine bill, and the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate having been closed by order of the House, the Clerk will read the bill by sections:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all articles known as oleomargarine, butterine, imitation butter, or imitation cheese, or any substance in the semblance of butter or cheese not the usual product of the dairy and not made exclusively of pure and unadulterated milk or cream, transported into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon the arrival within the limits of such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory or the District of Columbia enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such articles or substances had been produced in such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to permit any State to forbid the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in a separate and distinct form and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like yellow butter.

The following amendment, reported by the Committee on Agriculture, was read:

In line 11, page 2, strike out the word "yellow;" so as to read "causes it to look like butter."

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on this amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized. Does the gentleman rise to oppose the amendment?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we can not hear one word the gentleman says.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman asks for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize some one in opposition to the amendment first.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask some gentleman who supports this bill what the proviso in the first section of it means; and I desire to have order before I proceed further. It is a matter of very great importance.

The proviso of the bill, Mr. Chairman, reads as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to permit any State to forbid the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in a separate and distinct form and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character, free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like butter.

Now, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY] will remember that I asked the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY], while on the floor a few days ago, what was meant by this proviso. Without undertaking to explain it, which I believe he said he could not do, the gentleman referred me to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], whom he said had caused it to be inserted in the bill. I then called on the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to explain it, and he said the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] was mistaken; that he had nothing to do with it and knew nothing about it. Now, since that time I have been informed, in a private conversation with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY], that this provision is made and put into this bill to restrain the existing rights of the several States to act in reference to oleomargarine; to restrain the exercise of the inherent functions or police powers which the States have always retained and have now.

Since that time, Mr. Chairman, I have read the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ALLEN] of the committee reporting this bill, and at page 1361 of the RECORD he states in effect the same thing—that is, that it strikes out the present powers of the State governments. If that is the case, and I think it is, that provision should be remodeled.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Strike it out entirely.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And if the gentlemen who have so conscientiously worked to suppress or rather to outlaw this fraud have put something in this bill that they do not understand, or something more than they intended to, then this statement of mine is for the purpose of sharply challenging it to their attention and asking them to state clearly in the proviso what they really mean and let the House be fully informed. If they mean to prostrate the States, or if this proviso means to do so, then I am against this proposition. If they mean to strengthen the States, then I am for it; but as it reads, Mr. Chairman, which I may add is in the most abstruse language, very hard to understand, I am opposed to it.

I have submitted it to lawyer after lawyer on this side, and on first blush they say that it does not interfere with the State; but, after a moment's reflection, they say that the effect of it will be to paralyze State rights, which is wrong.

Now, which is it? Not one gentleman on the opposite side of the House has undertaken to explain this provision. Gentlemen upon this side, in private conversations with me, as well as the distinguished lawyer from Kentucky [Mr. ALLEN], in his speech, have said that it is a direct thrust at, a destruction of State powers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the case of Austin against The State of Tennessee, a cigarette case, reported in 179 United States, the Supreme Court clearly recognized the principle that the State has the right to exercise this police power. That is one of the rights which they have reserved, one of the rights they never surrendered and can not surrender, one of the rights they never should surrender, and one of the rights which I believe the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY] does not want to impair. We want those rights to remain as they are, and I call upon my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], from whom we have not heard, to explain to this House what the meaning of this proviso is. I am sure they will be equally as candid and frank in making the explanation as I have been serious and honest in bringing the matter to their attention and to the attention of the House.

Mr. THAYER. What was the case to which you referred? You did not tell us what the finding in that case was.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This was a case where the cigarette men——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to say to him that in the course of a few minutes an amendment will be offered which will cover the point to which he is referring, and I suggest that the gentleman wait until that amendment is offered, when he can continue his discussion when it will be more germane.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then you have an amendment covering that point?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And I hope the gentleman will wait a few minutes before he proceeds with his discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. We were unable to hear the Chair when he put the motion. What amendment was pending?

The CHAIRMAN. A committee amendment to strike out the word "yellow."

Mr. BARTLETT. And that has been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. That has been adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And now comes the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amend section 1 by adding thereto, after the word "butter," in the twelfth line of page 2 of the bill, the words "of any shade of yellow."

So that it will read:

Free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like butter of any shade of yellow.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman I wish to say a word on the amendment emanating from the majority of the committee. I shall support this amendment because it is in line with the position I have taken on this bill from the beginning. But I am unable to understand how gentlemen who have supported what is known as the Grout bill and its lineal descendants are able to give their concurrence to the pending amendment. I hold in my hand a postal card signed by a half dozen or so of my constituents, the printed heading of which reads as follows:

No substitute for the Grout bill!—We have not authorized and do not approve making any change in the Grout bill as it passed the House in the Fifty-sixth Congress. So we can not indorse H. R. 4, introduced by Mr. Tawney; but we most heartily indorse and approve H. R. 1, introduced by Mr. McCleary, which is our Grout bill word for word, and we very earnestly request you to support H. R. 1 vigorously.

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that every member of this committee has received scores of cards similar to this. I am informed that in the last Congress practically cartloads of petitions of a similar character were received by members of the then House, and it is perfectly well known to all of you who sit on this floor that the sentiment of the country has been cultivated to support what has been known as the Grout bill.

In further confirmation of what I have said on this subject I wish to direct attention to a petition which I hold in my hand, which is a printed copy of the original now on file with the Committee on Agriculture. The first paragraph of this petition reads as follows:

We, the undersigned editors of publications devoted to agriculture, and representing the sentiments of the farmers of the United States, believing that future prosperity and welfare of the farmers of this country depends very largely upon the preservation of the dairy industry upon the farm, earnestly petition your honorable body to enact into legislation during the present session what was known in the last session as the "Grout bill," which passed the House by the tremendous majority of 104, was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, and, while occupying a privileged position on the Senate Calendar, failed of passage because of the rush of important appropriation bills at the close of the session.

This petition is signed with the names of gentlemen who, from the heading, appear to be the editors of "all the leading agricultural publications in this country," representing a constituency of over 3,000,000 people. It is directly in line with the addresses delivered on this floor calling our attention to the fact that 50,000,000 of people, through the legislation of their own States, are demanding the passage of the Grout bill.

Now, I submit that the measure originally known as the Grout bill has been already so much changed that its father would not recognize it if he should meet it in the big road; and if this pending amendment is made to it the measure will be of such a character that the author of the bill would repudiate it. I hold in my hands the hearings before the Agricultural Committee, and from page 261 I wish to quote, in support of the statement I have just made, the statement of Mr. Grout. Let me explain that this gentleman was before the committee, expressing his views upon this proposition—the question of inserting or omitting the word "yellow"—the question presented in the pending amendment. Upon that question Mr. Grout spoke as follows:

In the second section of the bill there is a proviso, and I see that Mr. HENRY has changed the language there by putting in "yellow." I want to say that that language incorporated there is taken right from the decision in the Plumley case, from the supreme court in the Plumley case. It will be exceedingly dangerous to interpolate a word there that would change that one single particle, because the Lord knows where the lawyers would run with it.

On page 269 the same speaker says:

I say that is what we want the tax on, and we do not want any limitation on it; we do not want to say "yellow butter." I tell you, my friends, that this bill, just as your Uncle Dudley drew it, will cover this question and will accomplish the result, if it can be accomplished at all. Let them pay that 10-cent tax, whether the coloring be much or little, and if you do not stand on that I would not give a rush for this law. I want to go on record as saying so to you gentlemen here, and I am on record. I would not give anything for it if you do not put that in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
